(saith hee to the Prouost of marchants of Paris) this word assured, as from the mouth of your King, and take heed that Paris fall not into a relaps, which will be fatal and not recoverable.

But there was a brute spread ouer all France, that vnder colour of this assembly, they F practised an exemplary reuenge against the chiefe of the Estates. Advertisements came from all parts: this seare went from Chamber to chamber: the most apprehensue desired

A fitted to be satisfied. The Arch-Bishoppe of Ambrun makes report vnto the King, 1588 Lenore (saith the King) the liberties and prerogative of the Parliament: they ought to trust in my word. It is a sinne to growe in ielousie of your King: and these reports come not but from such as haue no loue to their King, but seeke to make him odious to his people. There shall neuer any cause growe from me to disjurb this assembly. In the end, the familiarity and thewes of loue from the King to the Duke and Cardinall of Guise, and (for their sakes) to the chiefe of the League, made them lay aside all suspicion of a bloudie act, whereof they were aduertised from all parts. And without doubt, if the League had not stirred vp the coales of forepassed indignities, the fire of his wrath had not perchance deuoured them.

B This blast past ouer, there are other attempts no lesse dangerous. The League sets them on worke that beares their badge, to hit the marke whereat they aimed. To put the King in disgrace, and to install the Duke of Guise in his thorne, (for the King of Naurris is now by this new fundamentall lawe, excluded from the royall succession.) But what meane they to do? The Collosse they seeke to build, shall bee their minette fire they kindle, shall burne them: the knife they forge, shall be thered in their owne bowells, and finally shall leaue of this League a shamefull and reprochfull memory. To hit this pretended marke, they must make the Kings actions odious to all the world, reproch to him his vreasonable prodigality, his dissembling, the oppression of his people, the erecting of newe offices, thereby to bandie against him C the most apparent families of the third Estate, wronged in the suppression of them: or elle (neglecting to redresse it,) they should declare him an enemy to the people, and a tyrant ouer his realme, and so the people should presently resolute to confine him into a monastery.

They still lay before him the wonderfull coldnesse of the greatest part of the Ca-tholikes to his loue and obedience, seeing themselves forced to liue a nongest them that had burnt their Churches, profaned their altars, massacred the Prelates & spoiled their goods. They beseech him to defend the Church, and to prefer the iniuries done to religion, before the violences committed against the state. They propound vnto him, the excessive impositions and subsidies, which had already withdrawne most part of D his subiects: and the filthy auarice of strangers, who by continual inuentions did cruelly impouerish France. They repress vnto him the abuses of the gouernment, the bestowing of benefices to all men indifferently, either married, or souldiars, the lechery, dissolutes and ignorance, of Prelates: the sale of Offices and places of iudgement. They exhort him not to deale in spirituall causes, or at the least to proceede holily, as it belongs to holie things. To degrade a great number, as well of Prelates, as of ciuill magistrates in soueraigne Courts and inferior Iurisdiccions, and to punish with death those ministers which by corruption haue crept into the Church, Iustice and gouernment, else hee cannot preserve the Estate. In the end, they presse him to reforme the excesse and disorders of his Court, the which are odious to so many E noble spirits, fraught with holinesse, magnanimity and courage, to so many great and rich maides as be among the Nobility, which beeing employed, would in fewe moneths repare the ruines of this Estate.

Such as find themselves interested in the cutting off the superfluous number of offices, and in the buying of their places, dissuade the King from this resolution, but to maintaine them in the honours which they enioye vnder the countenance of his Ma-iesty. The third Estate exhibit their complaints, of the excesse of taxes, and subsidies, wherein they are oppressed, of the customes, forraine impositions, rents vpon salt, entries, loans, gifts, increase & decrease of the prizes of money, with many other exactions and furcharges, whereof the King receiued not any benefite, but what was dipt in the bloud of his poore people. The Nobility complaines of seruices done without recompence, & indifferet distributiō of the Kings liberality. The Clergy exclaime, that money which hath bin drawn from the, had nothing aduanced the cause of religion.

1588 creation, and an intent to ease their subsidies. But oh politique stratagemes! The King yeelding to haue them reduced to the yeare 1576, sees himselfe deprived of all meanes to leuy his armies, and to entertayne the greatnesse of his Maiesties Estate. If he refuseth it, an occasion is giuen to murine the Estates, to chase away such as are neere his person, and to giue him a gouernour.

The Duke of Guise on the one side, dissuades the King to subiect his authority so much: but on the other side he prickes them forward to be vehement in their pursuits. In the end the King passeth this graunt of reduction: but he hopes to make it knowne vnto the Estates, that with so small meanes he cannot maintaine his royall dignity, nor the warre against the hereticks, which they had so solemnly sworne. They deuote of meanes to make vp the stocke, and demande an account of such as had gouerned the treasure, and abused the Kings bounty.

Effects of the
uers army.

But whilest they turne ouer their papers at the Parliament, let vs see the progresse of the two armies which we had left in field. That of the Duke of Neuers consisted of French, Swisses and Italians, with many voluntary gentlemen. Sagonne was Marshall of the light horse, la Chastre Marshall of the field, Chastaigneray, Lauerdin and many others commanded the troupes. Mauleon was the first object of their armes. It is a rathernesse to be obstinate in the defence of a place, which is not to be held: but it is a treachery to ill intreate them whome we haue receiued to composition. So this first victory was bathed with their bloods, who trusting in the force of their courages, neglected the weakenesse of their walls. Montagu was defended some daies by Cocombiers, who at the first saluting the Duke with a furious skirmish, putts him to some losse. But the Cannon hauing both shaken their walles and their constancies, they entered into capitulation, the which was honourable graunted the last day of November.

The Duke of Mayenne
stay at Lion suspect to Mandrot.

La Ganache, situated vpon the marches of Brittaine and Poitou, annoyed both the one and the other Prouince. Let vs leaue the armie there, to see howe the Duke of Mayenne spends his time at Lion. The desciins too lightly grounded vpon a peoples mutiny, are alwaies ruinous. The Duke of Mayenne knowes it well: and moreover there is nothing but blowes to be gotten in Daulphiné. He desires rather to attend the issue of the Parliaments in a pleasing and delightfull abode: but this stay is a great scourge to Mandrot. He fears to bee dispossessed of his gouernment. It is giuen to the Duke of Nemours, and therefore he wonderfully suspects the Duke of Mayennes presence. Finally hee grewe so zealous, as seized with apprehension, with the cholicke, gaueuer, the goutte, and the fluxe, he carried (the foure and twentieth of November) this testimony into the other world, by the mouth of father Edmond Anger a Iesuite, in his funerall sermon. That he had neuer signed the League, & that he died firme in his religion and the Kings seruice.

Whilest the King labored at the Parliament, to cut off all difficulties which prolonged the warre, and the Duke of Mayenne being at Lion suffered the heat of of his passage into Daulphiné to growe colde: Charles Duke of Sauoy foreseeing the dissipation of this Estate, hee thought that as a sonne and husband of two daughters illued fiō the bloud of France, he should be the first which should set his hand to the diuision. The marquisate of Salusses is in the midst of his territories, he thinks, that for such a prise he may well breake friendship and alliance with the King his neere kinsman, who of neere curtesie had newly deliuered vnto him Sauignan and Pignerol.

The Marquissate of Salusses turne it to
Sauoy.

With this dessein (seeing the Kings thoughts otherwise engaged then beyond the Alpes,) he makes a leuy of men, threatens Geneua, makes a shewe to beleege Montferiat, causeth the Marquis of Saint Sorlin to go to horse, and on all Saints night surpriseth the Towne of Carmagnole, and then the Cittadell, being vnfinished of victualls, which Saint Siluie successor to la Casse had drawne forth, with hope (saied hee) to refresh them: so as in lesse then three weekes he possessed all the Marquisate, leaving a reprochfull suspicion against the Captaines of the Cittadell, to haue treacherously exchanged 1588 A exchanged the double Canons of that ancient arenall of the warres of France, beyond the Alpes, with the double pistolets of Spain. This conquest made the Duke proud, and already in conceite he had deuoured both Prouence and Daulphiné. For a colour he wikes both to the Pope and King: That the generall respect of the Church had made him seize vpon these places, least Les Diguieres should make it a retreat and refuge for Huguenots: and the priuate interest of his Estates, which hee desires to maintaine in the puritie of the ancient religion, vnder the obedience of the holy Sea: and by his Ambassadour hee disguiseth this wrong with the goodlyest colours that may be.

Hee makes a shew, not to hold these places, but vnder the Kings authoritie: but in time hee vsurpes all actes of Soueraignty: hee displaceh his Maiesties officers, beates downe the armes of France, sets vp the crosse of Sauoy, and in a brauery hee causeth peeces of siluer to be coyned with a centaure treading a Crowne ouerwhelmed vnder his foore, and carrying this deuise, Oportune. The King iustly moued with this vsurpation, applies this branche to the body of the conspiracies of the League: he resolues now to pacifie the ciuill warres, to attend after forrainers: and euen then hee determines to giue the Protestants a peace, and to vse their assistance against such as make a benefit of the discords of the realme. Such as respected truly the glorie of the French, gaue him to vnderstand, that hee must appease both Huguenots and Ligner, and seeke reuenge of this new indignitie: and hunt the Wolfe which breakes into the fold, whilest the Shepheards are at variance. Shall a petty Prince take from a King of France, the pawne which remains to recouer Naples and Milan? foure hundred peeces of Canon, which might beate the proudest Fortes of the Spaniards to powder? that ancient see of Daulphiné, comprehended in the gifts which Prince Hubert made to the Crowne of France, whereof our Kings haue so often receiued homage and fealty of the Marquises, and haue often seized thereon for forfeiture and treachery?

The Kings
desseigne vp-on this succede.

All the Kings seruants, all the Courts of Parliament, all the assemblie of Estates, iudge that these be the effects of the League, and that this inuasion is not without the intelligence of the Duke of Guise: euen those which fauour his part, cannot digest it. But to auoyde this common hatred which was ready to fall vpon him, hee beseecheth his Maiesty, onely to assure his people, and make them to taste the frutes of contentment, which he had promised in the othe of the holy vnion, that hee would quench the fire which the Huguenots did nourish in this realme, and giue him this commission against the Stranger, he will be the first that shall passe the Alpes, to make the Sauoy cast vp his gorge.

But could they hope for any remedy from him, who by his continuall practises with strangers, had giuen life and motion to the mischief? So the King, considering that neyther his Edict of reuinion, nor the othe to depart from all associations, produced the effects were promised: and that the League (consenting to the pernicious desseignes of the Stranger,) had made the way for the breach of the sayd vnion, hee thinks himselfe no more bound to the othe of this vnion, and euen then denieth to bee reuenged of all the offences past. In the meane time he dissembles his discontent.

As these newes troubled the assemblie at Blois, the King of Nauarre (seeing the practises of the League had excluded him, whereas hee should hold the first place) let another in the Towne house at Rochelle, and by their aduise hee sent (in the name of the French exiled for religion, a common petition to the Estates, beseeching the King, To restore them the liberty of the first Edict, which they call of Ianuaire. To appoint a Nationall Councell, where controuersies of religion may be mildred, futed, and holily resolved, To grant them restitution, and free enioying of their goods, To suffer their petition to bee inrowled, and the contents thereof granted by his clemencie, to the end that nothing may bee done to their preiudice.

1588. Estates, affected to aduance the League. And therefore, not satisfied with the King's owne mouth a more particular declaration, touching the perpetuall insubordination of the King of Nauarre, and other Princes of the blood his Cousins, adherents (Lutherans) and fautors of hereticks, to the succession of this Crowne.

The conclusion of this Parliament should haue bene for the good quiet of the Common-weale. And doubtlesse some smal number (whose wills were not tied to the passions of the Leaguers,) wished that remedy which had bin practised in former times against most pernicious heresies: which was a free and lawfull Councell, vniuerall or nationall: but the greater part ouer-ruled both the King and the Estates. The League, to ruine the state, will ouerthrowe the pillars, which be the Princes of the blood: and if the branches of Valois and Bourbon, that is to say, if all the race of Saint Leuys be not degraded, they cannot passe ouer the Crowne to the family of Lorraine. The King by his Edict promisseth to dispose of the succession: but he and the Queene his wife are yet in the vigor of their age, they hope that God will blesse them with heires males. Hee takes no pleasure they should harpe vpon this string: it is a blemish to his authority, and disturbes him before he is readie to sleepe: when as a Prince hath named his successor, his testament is made.

Yet he is content to satisfie the violent appetits of the League. He suffers them to dispose of the succession, and (in the assemblie of all his subjects) to exclude the lawfull successor: hee is content they should propound that which most part of the deputies had already resolved. The Clergie had the 4. of Nouember condemned the King of Nauarre for an heretike, the chiefe of them, relapse, excommunicate, deprived of the government of Guienne, and of all his dignities, vnworthy of all successions, Crownes and realmes. The Arch-bishop of Ambrun, the Bishop of Bazas, the Abbot of Citeaux and other Clergie men impart it to the deputies of the Nobility and third Estate: all consent to the first conclusion, and appoint twelue of euery chamber to acquaint the King with their resolutions.

But the King of Nauarre had often giuen them to vnderstand, that he was borne during the permission of both religions, instructed and bred vp in one from the which he cannot in conscience depart, without better instruction: neither hope nor dispaire of a Crowne can drawe him to so violent and rash a change: he should thereby incur the blame of inconstancie, infidelity and hipocrisie: He is, and alwaies will be readie to receiue instruction from a free and lawfull Councell. These submissiōs are full of iustice and consideration: he defends nothing obstinately, it is the honour and zeale of his conscience that binds him. There is no reason then (saied the King) to condemn him without hearing. Let vs consider with iudgement & foresight, whether it be expedient to summon him againe, to sweare the Edict of vniōn, and to declare himselfe a Catholike.

The Parliament is not of this aduice. The Cardinall of Bourbon his Vncle (say the deputies) hath once obtayned absolution for him: the Queene Mother hath labored to winne him. The King hath sent Doctōrs to reclaim him: he is bred vp from his Cradle in this newe opinion, condemned by the Councell of Trent and many others. The Consistory hath receiued him into grace, he is fallen into the error which he had abjured: he is therefore an heretike: hee is relapse, and vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of respect, and vnworthy to be praied for. The holy see of Rome hath declared him a Schismaticke, excommunicate, incapable of the succession of the Crowne: the Estates therefore must ratifie this sentence. To conclude, an Heretike cannot raigne in France, it is an incompatible thing with the Coronation and oath which he ought to take, hurtfull to the honour of God, and preiudiciall to the good of this Realme.

Soft and faire: nature and the Common consent of nations will, that the accused should bee heard. God himselfe, who hath no neede to bee satisfied by humane witnessess, and is not bound to any iurisdiction, would not condemne our 1588. But must before he called him into iudgement; examined him, checked him, and heard his excuses. Heare then the King of Nauarre: he may say vnto you, that the Pope himselfe hath noted him of heresie: hee knoweth not yet any other truth, then that herein the Queene of Nauarre his mother hath bred him. If he hath at any time yielded vnto the force and violence of the time, hee had not then his will free, and as soone as opportunity gaue him meanes to retire from Court into his Countie of Auern, he framed his beliefe to the modell of that which had bene prescribed him: but protesting alwayes to the Estates and Parlements of France; that he hath no greater desire in his soule, then to see the seruice of God vntied vnder one religion, by the meanes of a free and lawfull assemblie of the vniuersall Church, or a nationall Councell of the French Churches.

The Deputies notwithstanding (especially the Clergie,) will allowe of no reason. They are for the most part transported with passion, and apprehend nothing but what may aduance the League. If the King refuseth this article, the Duke of Guise will dissolve the Estates, and laie all the blame vpon his Maiestie. He hath so well provided for his affaires, as he holds himselfe master of the Castle of Blois, and of the Kings person. There is neither gate, hall, chamber, nor Cabinet, but the keyes are at his pleasure: He hath great forces ready. He checkes them that speake not to his liking: their voices and consents are forced in the Parliament house: he puts in, and puts out, and doth what he pleaseth. Those whom the King and Parlements hold importable, finde access and support with him: To conclude, see the first Prince of the blood, the first of the most ancient, and most famous house that doth at this day weare a Crowne, the first of that royall branch of Bourbon, which onely remaines after many sisters and cousins of Anjou, Alençon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgogne, Angoulême, and Orleans, and which onely succeeded that of Valois, deprived of the right which nature hath giuen him; without calling him, or hearing his iustificatiōs. The Clergie sayes, he ought to be no more cited, his heresie, his incapacity to the Crowne is apparent. The Bishop of Chaalons in Champagne, deliueres this conclusion to the Nobility. The Bishop of Cominge, to the third Estate: and the Arch-bishop of Ambrun, to the King, to make a law thereof: and then followed the last act of the League: the death of a dispossessed King.

But oh men! the Eternall lookes on you, and laughes at your Counsells: he nowe comes vpon the stage to act his part, and to bring forth effects far from his thoughts. The King is aduertised from all parts, of a great conspiracy against his Maiestie. The Duke of Effernon assures him by letters. The Duke of Mayenne (iealous it may be of his brothers greatnes) aduertiseth his Maiesty from Lion, by a Knight of worship: and the Duke of Anmale, from Blois it telle by his owne wife, that the Duke of Guise had very pernicious desseines: that the houre of the execution did approach: that they refused to seize on him, and to lead him to Paris.

These aduertisements kindle a newe courage in the King, hee meanes to preuent him, and discouers his minde to foure, whom he knowes as faithfull to his Maiesty, as enemies to the damnable projects of the League: He must suppress this newe starr in the East, whom the people worshipped already. The present necessity will not suffer him to bring him forth in viewe: the Popes respect retaines him this oath to protect the Estates, makes him irresolute: the troubles, which this execution will cause in people disposed to the League, makes him doubtfull: yet he must die. Hee hath no other way in France but is a simple subject: and yet without the Kings authority, contrary to his Maiesties commandment, he hath built a League, had intelligence with the stranger, leauied soldiers, attempted vpon townes, and broken the publike peace. He continues his resistance against the oath of the Edict of vniōn, with the Cardinall Morosse, Legate of the Pope, and Don Inigo of Mendoza Ambassador of Spain. He confirms his priuie negotiations with the Gouernors of revolted townes. Hee published by his declarations, that hee hath not taken armes; but for Gods and the Kings seruice: and yet by the surprise of so many townes, he hath hindered the aduance-1588 ment of the Kings army in Guienne against the Huguenots. The object of his armes is the safety and religion of the Catholikes, and to deprive the King of Nauarre of all hope of succession to the Crowne: and in the meane time it appears, that he hath fought the loue of the King of Nauarre: he hath promised to giue him his sonne in hostage, and to meete him with seenteene Princes of his house, at the riuer of Lore, to serue him, and make him King of France. Many letters intercepted discover, that after his maiesties pardon of many capitall crimes, he renues his disleynes, against the King and against his estate. The surprile of the Marquisate of Saluffes is by his intelligence. He disgraceth the Kings actions, he blames him to haue vnwillingly made warre against the Huguenots: to haue sold the said Marquisate, that vnder colour of recovering it, hee might diuert the warre against the Heretikes. In steed of reducing the Townes held by the Huguenots, hee keepes his Captaines and men of warre at Blois, vpon assurance of a profitable change. Hee hath caused bookes to bee Printed in fauour of the lawfull succession of the house of Lorraine to the Crowne.

Objections against the Duke of Guise

At the Barricadoes this voice was heard: It is no longer time to dally, let vs lead my Lord to Reimes. He hath suffered himselfe to be saluted by the people, with cries and acclamations which belong onely to the Soueraigne Prince. He hath vaunted that he was able to take the King prisoner, or to do worse, although he entered but with eight horses into Paris, being assured of the force and wills of the Cittizens: He hath seized on the places of strength within Paris: made Governours, Magistrates and officers at his pleasure: He hath so corrupted the Estates, as the Deputies speake not, but by his mouth: they produce nothing but what hath beene first examined in his Council. Many cry out, that he staves too long before he strikes. Hee speakes no more but in termes of a Souereigne, with pride, disdain and threats: He hath refused to subscribe the Edi& which the King would publish, in cases of treason: He doth already seale Letters patents with his great seale: He forbids the Commons to giue victuals or munition to such companies as the King had sent vnto them. There remains no more, but to consume in his person that ancient greatnes sometimes vsurped by the Maors of the pallace: and to deale with the King, as Charles Martel had done with Childeric. In the ende, they represent vnto the King, the Proesse of Salcedo, a party in this conspiracy, the counsells of Nancy, and of Paris in Lent last, whereof the chiefe point was: To seize vpon the Kings person: the instructions of the Aduocate David: the letters of the Queene Dowager of Denmarke, to the Duke of Lorraine her sonne: the attempt of the Barricadoes, and (to heape vp the measure) the practices, corruptions, and violences done by the Duke of Guise to the Estates. The like and lesse crimes haue in former ages brought more famous heads then the Duke of Guises to the blocke. The Leagues and practices of an Earle of Harcourt, of a Constable of Saint Paul, of a Duke of Nemours, haue brought them to shameful endes.

Pope Sixtus now liuing, hath of late put to death the Earle of Pepoli of the noblest families of Italy, only for that he had concealed some banished men in his house. The Duke of Guise himselfe did of late pursue with all violence the disobedience of the Duke of Anjou. His holiness hath beleueed, that religion was the onely motive of the Duke of Guises armes. The Barricadoes, with the vsurpation of the Bastille, and Bois de Vincennes, haue made him to change his beleefe. Hee himselfe hath layde vnto the bishop of Paris, that the fact was too bold, that the estate is interested, and that the offence is irreconcilable. Hee hath written vnto the King, aduising him to assure himselfe of the Estates at what price soeuer: that in such imminent dangers, hee must seeke out all extraordinary remedies: and vpon this consideration hee graunted the King a confessor to absolve him of all, reseruing the matter to the holy sea.

Objection.

Yea, but the Estates are vnder the kings oath & prote&ti&. With out doubt an oath was neuer brok& without rep&ntance. But how is the soueraigne bound to his subiect who by rebellion 1588. Rebellion hath violated his oath to his Prince. Necessitie forceth the law: great punishments of rebels haue beene often done in great assemblies. The Kings of England and Poland do practise it well, and our Charles hath died his sisters nuptials with more blood then wine. Moreover, the Duke of Guise hath great credit with the people of France. It is true: but his partie hath no credit but with the multitude: the which is a very moueable and inconstant foundation. Men of account, Townes, gouernours, and the Kings officers, mutine not but by meanes of the multitude, and seeing him fallen that gaue mouing to their rebellion, they will containe themselves. Lige, say they who feare least this violent counsell which they gaue him in to vrgent a necessitie, (should be discovered) the Duke of Guise will surprise you. They haue already published in Paris, that this is your climacterical yeare: they shewe forth the rasor that shall shauo you: they demaund how long they shall suffer you to line in a Cloyster. The lightning goes before the thunder: the guilt of treason, is extraordinary in the head: to the punishment goes before the instructions and formes of Iustice. One must punish the offendor, and then informe of the offence. The mildest common-weales, most politike, and greatest enemies to rigour, haue alwaies held, That whereas the estate is in danger, they may begin with the execution. In the end the King is faultied, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of his reuenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition.

The Kings last resolution

By the Kings countenance, or some wordes let slippe by some one of the foure, they find it dangerous to continue long at the Estates. But the more the Duke of Guise enters into discourse, the more the Kings good countenance disswades him. And the Archbishop of Lion attending a Cardinals hatt within a few dayes from Rome: Retrying yourselfe from the Estates (said he vnto him) you shall beare the blame to haue abandoned France in so important an occasion, and your enemies making their profit of your absence, wil soon ouerthrowe al that which you haue with so much paine effected for the assurance of religion.

Man doth often loose his iudgement vpon the point of his fall. Aduertisements were come to him from all parts, both within & without the realme, from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine and Sauoye, that a bloodie Catastrophe would dissolue the assemblie. The Almanakes had well obserued it: it was generally bruted in the Estates, that the execution should be on Saint Thomas day. The eue before his death, the Duke himselfe sitting eare to dinner, found a seroule vnder his napkin, aduertising him of this secret ambush. But (as ambition blinds those whome shee hath raised vp to the pikes nest, and the faine of Gods iudgements confounds such as trust in their authoritie) he writ vnderneath, with his owne hand, They dare not: and threw it vnder the table.

The Duke of Guise following the counsell of the Cardinall Morosin, had the one and twentieth of December incensed the King a new, by some bold and presumptuous needles. Lige, said he) being I find that the affaires decline from bad to worse, and that those things which seemed curable, are growne desperate: I beseech your Maestie to receiue againe the charge you haue committed vnto mee, and giue me leaue to retire my selfe. He spake this, to the end that by this discontent hee might take an occasion to dissolue the estates, and bringing the King into extreame hatred with his subjects, hee might play the last act of his long foreplotted Tragedie. The King had the two and twentieth day following, prepared seuen of his fine and forte: they were gentlemen whome hee had appointed to be neere his person, besides the Cardinall Archers of his gard) to execute his will, and by many dispatches had assured those Townes which hee held to bee most mutinous. The three and twentieth, hee troubles his Councell somewhat more carely in the morning then was vsuall, hauing a deuotion to go after dinner, and to spend the holidayes at our Ladie of Gen. The Cardinalls of Vendosme, Guise, and Gondy, the Arche-Bishop of Lion, the Marshalls of Almont and Retz, the Lords of d'O, Rambouillet, Maintenon, Marcell and Petremolie ouerfeers of the Treasor, were assembled. The Duke of Guise comes, and attending the beginning of the Councell, sends for a handkercher: (the groom of his 1588. his chamber had forgotten to put one into his hole.) Pericard his Secretarie, mada-ring to commit this new aduertisement to any mans report, ties a note to one of the corners thereof, saying, Come forth and see your selfe, else you are but a dead man. But they stay the page that carried it. Larchant Captaine of the Kings gard causeth another to be giuen vnto him with all speed by Saint Prix the chiefe groom of the Kings chamber. The Castle gates are shutt, and the Councell sits about eight of the clocke.

The spirit of man doth often prophecie of the mischeefe that doth pursue him.
So whilest they dispute of a matter propounded by Petremolle, the Duke fees strange alterations, and extraordinary distemperatures, and amidst his distrust, a great fainting of his heart. Saint Prix presents vnto him some prunes of Brignolles, and raisins of the sunne. Hee eats, and thereupon the King calls him into his Cabinet by Renoll one of the secretaries of his Estate, as it were to confer with him about some secret of importance. The Duke leaues the Councell to passe vnto the Cabinet: and as he did sit vp therapistric with one hand to enter, they charge him with their swords, daggers, and pertuisians: yet not with so great violence, but he shewed the murderers the last endeauours of an inuincible valour and courage.

The Duke of Guise slaine.

Thus liued, and thus died Henry of Lorraine Duke of Guise: a Prince worthie to be in the first rankes of Princes, goodly, great, tall of proportion, amiable of countenance, great of courage, readie in the execution of his enterprises, popular, dissem-bling, but covering the secrets of his minde, with his outward behauiour, embracing all times and occasions, politike in stratagems, making much of his souldiars, and honouring his Captaines. But a Prince who hath blemished the greatest beautie of his practises by extreame ambition, factions, a great bragger, vaine in beleeuing of Southsayers, who assured him of his greatnes, and of the change of his familie into a royaltie, proud, not able to submit his hopes, euen to those from whence hee should hope for his aduancement, giuing men to vnderstand by his inclination, that he was not borne to obey, but to commaund, and with this dessein, he framed the minds of the French, by his first actions, to beleue that hee had partes fit to make a strange alteration in a Realme. But let vs applie that great diuine Oracle, and tremble at the apprehension of the horror of Gods iudgements, For this cause God will destroy thee in the end: D hee will pull thee out of thy tabernacle, and thy root out of the land of the liuing. The iust shall see it and feare, and shall laugh at him, saying: behold the man that hath not taken God for his ayde and succour, but hath trusted to the multitude of his riches, and hath fortified himselfe in vanitie.

At the noyse hereof, the Cardinall of Guise (being amazed) recouers the doore to go away. Larchant staies him with the Arche-bishop of Lyon, and lodgeth them in a little chamber aboue the Kings, lately built for Capuchins and Fuellans. The Cardinall in the heat of this tumult casts forth some words, which he would neuer haue de-liuered being well aduised. They report it vnto the King. The King commaunds La Baside and Valansay, being both of the fine and fortie to kill him. The first excuseth himselfe, the other accepts the charge, and accompanied with fixe others, goes to the Cardinalls chamber, to make him a companion of his brothers death: but being readie to do the execution, I knowe not what cold apprehension quenched this heate, which had moued him to bath his hands in the blood of so great a Prelat without respect of his order.

The Cardinall of Fourbon, the Duchesse of Nemours (mother to the Duke of Guise), the Duke of Nemours her sonne by the second marriage, the Prince Gin- uille now Duke of Guise, and the Duke of Elbauf had at the same instant gards appointed them, to bee assured of their persons. Pericard being kept prisoner, discouered all the practises of the League, and by the instructions hee had in his keeping, F hee informed the King at large of all his maisters desseins. The Earle of Brissac, Bis Daulphin and some other gentlemen (faithfull to the Duke of Guise) the President Neully, the Prouost of marchants at Paris, Compan & Cotteblanche, sherifes of
the

A the said Towne, and Le Roy Lieutenant of Amiens, were put in pryson: the rest stayed neither for boots nor spurres to dislodge. 1588.

Rosieux Secretarie to the Duke of Mayenne, and sonne in Lawe to Armonuile Maior of Orleans, had already by special posts, aduertised his master of what had pass-& so practiseth them of Orleans, as Entragues comming from Blois to be assured of the Towne found a generall reuolt. Doubtlesse the Inhabitants were inclined to the kings obedience, if before he would haue graunted them, at their humble sute, an other go-uernour at his maiesties choise then him, who at the first had ingaged them, and afterwards by his wilfullnes suffred them to runne into the laborinth of rebellion. It is good to yeeld something to a mutinous multitude, not to thrust them into dysaire.

The execution done, the King carries newes therof to the Queene mother. Madame (saith he) I will hereafter raigne aloane, I haue no more companions. She answered him, God graunt my sonne it fall out well for you: but haue you giuen order to assure the Townes where the name and memorie of the Duke of Guise hath credit and authority. This vnex-pected speech did wonderfully moue the Queene Mother, but that of the Cardinall of Fourbon gaue her a deadlie wound. Ah Madame (saied he, she comming to visit him beeing a prisoner and sicke) you haue brought us so slaughter. She excusing her selfe that shee had neither consented nor giuen Councell in this action, left the Cardinall doubling his complaints, and transported with griefe she died the fift of Iannary following.

Death of the Queene Mother.

Arnight they drawe the Cardinall and the Arch-bishoppe from their Chamber, to lodge them in a straighter and more obscure place, and there to passe the night, whilest that the King, with-held the considerations of the quality of a Prelate, a Peere of France, Arch-bishop of Reims, Cardinall of Rome, and President of his order at the Estates, consulted either of his execution, or freedome from prison.

But Iustice hath no respect of persons: and treason is a worse president in a Cardinall then in a simple Preeft. Moreouer the Cardinall might succeed in his brothers credit, and his threats seemed dangerous if he liued longer. So the King giues Captaine Gass commission to kill him. He craues pardon: but foure hundred Crownes do easilie finde foure ministers for the execution. The Arche-bishop had his life saied, at the humble sute of the Baron of Lux his Vncle. The King loued this gentleman and pretended to drawe from the Prelate all the Quintessence of the League. The punishment of these two, freed the King of Nauarre from being the cause of the misferit of these ciuill warres, seeing the King had thereby noted the first author of these troubles. But this Prince was neuer seene without a singular constancy in his greatest crosses, nor an admirable modestie in his highest prosperities. Hee vnderstands of the death of two of his mightiest enemies, and would gladlie haue seene the Kings wrath and forces turned against the house of Lorraine, whereby he might make his profit in France by the fall thereof, and applie it to his aduantage. But Noble mindes neuer locke on their enemies head, but with a heauie countenance. Hee laments not so much the death but the misery of them of Guise: and yet continues his enterprife which hee had vpon Niort, and the foure and twentieth of December, vnder the Conduct of Saint Gelais, Parabieres, Harambure, Ranques, Preau, Valieres, and others, hee forced and scaled the Towne beeing amazed, and spoiled it, without any slaughter but of twentie fine, or thirty men, no rauishing of women, nor iniurie to the Cler-ge. The same daie hee receiued the Castell by composition from Malicorne, by the King furnished with fine great Cannons, and two verie long Culuerins, with the which the Lieutenant of the Towne a wicked and a turbulent man, wanted (when they were cast) to salute the King when hee approached the walles of Niort.
F But the great furie of the victors armes, hauing slaine him in the beginning of the fight, was the cause he made not an exemplary compensation, for the outrages and the vnworthie speeches hee had vsed against the said King and the Princes of the blood.

Niort taken by the King
of Nauarre.

1589. The Duke of Nemours, on the other side battered Ganache, & the fourth of February. A uing spent eight hundred Cannon shot), hee made two breaches, and gaue an assault, with the losse of aboute three hundred men, and growing resolute in this conquest, where his honor was engaged, hee lets Plessisgouste, Capitaine of the place vnderstand that hee had wonne reputation enough in the defence of so weake a place: that his obstinacie did preiudice the King of Nauarres affaires: That the King by the execution done at Blois, had sufficiently declared warre against the League, and that he must to imploy the saied Kings forces against them. Plessis aduertiseth the King his matter, he marcheth to succor him, but his violent trauell on foote to get him a heate in an extreame colde season, made him stay so dangerously sicke of a feuer at Saint Pere, as the newes of his death was carried to Court. So Plessis yeelded vp the Towne, his B armes and baggage saued.

Ganache yeelded to the Duke of Nemours.

But this royall armie came to nothing. The Duke went to refresh himselfe at his house, wauering some moneths doubtfull of his party: and the King of Nauarre (whom God would vie in to confute a time, to bring him vpon the Theater, nor as a disin-herited Child, according to the intent of the Estates, but to reach men that their stuning is in vaine against the decrees of his diuine providence,) hauing recovered his perfect health, assured himselfe of the places neere vnto Niort, Saint Maixant, Mallespaze, Chastelleraut, Loudun, Lisle Bonchard, Mirebeau, Vinonne and others, pretending to do the King some great and notable seruice.

Error in State.

The King by this blowe had amazed, but not suppressed the League. He had be- C gun well for the waranty of his Estate, but he must not do things by halves. In stead of going to horse, making his armes to glister, shewing himselfe betwixt Orleans and Paris, calling backe his army out off Poitou, to oppote it against the attempts of the Duke of Mayenne, and (being armed, and the Townes amazed at this great effect) to diuert the mischiefe which oppressed him within fewe monthes, hee returns to his first remedies, being soft and fearefull, against a mad multitude: hee is content to send words to retayne his subiects already entred into sedition: hee releaseth some prisoners whom he held least dangerous, continues the Estates, renues the Edict of Union, and by a generall forgetting of what was past, thinks they will lay downe their armes against him, to imploy them against the King of Nauarre. But a multitude growes D mad with mildnesse, and is retheyned by leuerty. The King finds, that in lesse then fixe weekes, Tours and Baugency are the frontiers of those prouinces that were vnder his obedience. And whereas he thought to begin, hee nowe ceaseth to raigne. So God, who had laughed at the vaine attempts of the one, will likewise heape vpon the other, remedies no lesse violent then those he had practised.

Pa is sens info-lencies.

Nowe manie awaked from their amazement, and began to stirre: the people studied of newe mutinies and new armes. Orleans shut vp their gates, the Towne made barricadoes against the Cittadell: Paris shewed the furie of their mutinie against the Louure, they beate downe the Kings armes, impryson his seruants, and atwell by their ransomes and spoile, as by a voluntary contribution, they leuie a great summe of money for the warre. Marteau, Cotteblanche, Compain, Roland and others (deli-uered vpon promises to reclaime the Parisiens) had contrariwise seduced the people.
The sixteene (let vs knowe them by their names, euen as they are set downe in an oration made by the Bourgeses of Paris to the Cardinal Caietan) la Bruyere, Crucé, Fufsyle Clerc, the Commillary Louchard, Morlier, Senault, the Comissary de Bart, Drouart an Aduocate, Aluequin, Emonnot, Iablier, Messier, Passart, Oudineau, Tellier & Morin a pro-cutor of the Chasteler (euery one of which had many Agents & followers) like sixteene furies coming out off hell, sharpened their weapons, & kindled the coales of murder & dissolutenes, first at Paris, & then in a maner in all the good townes of the realme, being seasoned with the leuaine of these furious tribuns. The Preachers (fire brands of these furies) came not into the pulpit, but to poure forth reproches, and injuries against the King, and by an Iliade of Curtes to kindle the peoples mindes to rebellion.
The people came neuer from their sermons, but hauing fire in their heads, readines in their

A their feet to runne, and disposition in their hands, to fall tumultuously vpon such as were not branded with the marke of the League. Hee was neither a good nor a zealous Catholike that had not a beadroule of outrages to detest and abhorre that execution of Blois.

The porters at the Palace babled nothing, but a cursing of the Kings life: an ele-gieto lament the calamitie of these two bretheren: an oration in memorie of the commendable exploits of the Duke of Guisé, in Hongary against the Turke, at Iarnac against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour against the Reistres of Thore, at Vimory and at Aunau. They cried aloud at Paris: That France was now sicke, and could not bee cured but by giuing her a drinke of French blood. And because they haue not the bodie at their deuotion, those things he possesseth must suffer for it: his furniture at the Louure, his pictures are broken, his armes beate downe, his images dragged vp and downe, his great seale defaced: they call him impious, vniust, vilaine, pro-phane, tyrant, damned. The Colledge of Sorbonne concludes by a publike act of the 7. of Ianuary, That the people of France are freed from the othe of obedience and fealtie which they ought to Henry of Valois, and that lawfully, and with a good conscience, they may arme against him, receiue his reuenues, and imploy it to make warre against him.

On the other side, Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne, dreaming on his brothers death, prouided for the assurance of his owne life, and consulted with the Arche-bishops Officiall, the Lord of Botheim Seneshall of Lionnois, and some others of the chiefs, whether there were any safety for him within their Towne. We are (sayd they) bound vnto the King before all others. Make no tryall (we pray you) of your seruants, in that which shall bee contrary to the Kings will. Arme not your selfe against him: without doubt hee will seeke your seruice, when you shall submit the passion of reuenge vnto reason, and will aduance your houte to the good of all France, the which trembles with apprehension of the calamities which this warre shall cause. If the people call you, to set them at liberty, you shall abandon them to the spoile: and to cerend the Monarchie against the King, you shall make your selfe the head of a confused and monstrous Anarchie. God did neuer forget the protection of Kings against their mutinous subiects. They bee the image of God, the children of heauen: and whosoeuer armes against them, armes against heauen. Moreouer the winde of the peoples fauour, may for a time fill your sayles, and carrie your desseignes violently to Sea, but they are inconstant, light, and disloyall. And if they haue shaken off the yoke of dutifull obedience and loue to their King, what shall they doe to a Prince, to whome they shall not bee bound, but as to the Protector of their mutinie?

The Duke of
counselle.

They spake truly, for after the tryall of all sorts of governments, France must in the end returne to a royaltie: and the Duke (by a commendable resolution,) might haue vnited the mindes which his brother had diuided. But when as others represented vnto him the aduantage hee should haue to succeed in the fauour, credit, and au-thoritie of his brother, and by consequence his owne hopes: hee reiects the integritie of the first counsell: coniures all the friends of his houte to reuenge: parts from Lyon Christmas day: in his passage hee assures himselfe of Mafcon, Chalon and Iyon. The Court of Parliament there, refused to consent to this rebellion, and therefore the chiefe were driuen away, and some imprisoned, others (apprehending the losse of their commodities,) did easily submit their neckes to the yoke of a new Democratie. At Dijon hee receiued Letters from the King, promising to surcease the punishment of forepassed faults, with the death of his bretheren, whom (sayd he,) I haue caused to dye, to saue my life from the danger whereof you did aduertise me.
The Duke (attributing the Kings clemency to some weake & abiect affection, proceeding from feare, either to haue him his enemy, or to loose his friendship) grows obstinate in his resolution, reiects the Kings officers, giues commission to Rosne, S. Paul, and others, to command in Champagne & Brie, and to seize vpon the best places: he comes to Troyes, where

the King to

1588 where the Towne (long before corrupted by the infected humors of the League) receiued him with as great honor as they could haue done their King: and in all places where he passed, they were easily drawne into rebellion, every Towne following themselves after the modell of Paris and Orleans.

Three thousand men sent from Paris, to succour the Chenaliere d'Aumale besieged in Orleans by the Marshall of Aumont, with the Nobilitie of the Court, (some on foot and horse, and the Kings guards,) had bene defeated neere vnto Estanton by Fargis and Montigni: but the Marshall vnderstanding of the Duke of Mayenne approach, rayseth the siege, and retyres to Boisgency. In the meane time, the King himselfe in person did view and examine the conclusions of the Estates: but this same enterprise of the Dukes, made him to leaue the worke imperfect, & to provide for the safetie of his person: and for a conclusion, the fiftenth and sixteenth of Ianuary, hee heard the Deputies greeces and complaints vpon the disorders which afflicted France.

The Estates dissolved.
The Arch-Bishop of Bourges.
The Arch-Bishop of Bourges speech.

The Arch-Bishop of Bourges, President for the Clergie after the Cardinals death, imputed the cause of our miseries to contempt of religion, which breaking the bonds that tie vs vnto God, had in like sort diuided the hearts and willes of families and Commonalties. Hee greatly commended the Kings zeale to religion: insisted long vpon the abuses of the Church, which the corruption of the time had bred: the vniuersity promotion of Prelats: the nomination (to Abbaies, and other spirituall dignities) of all sorts of persons, fouldiars, ignorant men, stubborn men, gardeniers, simoniacs, women, & childen touching the alienation of the Clergie lands, spualitie of benefices, usurpation of the reuenues of hospitalls, deprauation of that goodly ancient order, whereby none might come vnto Commanderies of the order of the Knights of Saint John of Ierusalem, vnlesse hee were a gentleman of three descents: disorders of vniuersities and monasteries, in former times the nurceries of holy fathers. Then hee turned his discourse to the disorders noted in the Nobilitie of France, who were in former ages the terror of all nations, and from whome neighbour nations confesse to haue learned the exercise and profession of cheualrie: vpon the excessie of men of war, vpon the wasting of the treasore, & other disorders which spring from these first heades: finally hee beseecheth the King, to make a good reformation, whereby his people should multiplie, Justice should daily flourish, and peace should bee settled in the Realme.

The Duke of Brissac.
Charles of Cossé Earle of Brissac, chief Pantler & chief Fawconer of France, newly restored to fauour, & President for the Nobility, shewes that they be not the hands of Fortune, which emiouned his Mothers forehead with this double diademe. It is God, who hath ennobled him our King, who had before chosen him King of a more remote nation, for the pietie, faith, clemencie, and magnanimitie wherewith hee hath bene endued from his tender age. That heresie, schisme, and discord, which are crept into the peoples hearts, haue not taken their beginning vnder his raigne, whom God hath raised vnto the furthest of France, to bee reuenged by him, and aduanced above all the nations of Christendome, who draw their firme support from the stabilitie of his Crowne. That the wished victories in France ouer heresie, shall be vnto the King but a continuance of the route and desolate of that fearefull armie of Rebels, Langueuets, Suisses, and French Huguenots, which (like so many trumpets) proclaim to all places, the honours, prayses, and victories of his Maiestie. That now those voyes, fastings, teares, and toyles of the ancient French, are heard, who seemed to demand vengeance against the fire, furie, and rage of those, who (after so many religious ages) haue violated the sepulchres of their fathers and ours, and would take from amongst vs that onely religion which the holy fathers haue planted in old time throughout the world.

Then hauing represented the zeale and affection of the Nobilitie to assist the King, to restore religion, and the State to their former beautie, following the example and the hereditarie vertue of their Ancestors, who had chased and vanquished the Goths, Vandales, 1589. A Vandales, Arriens, Albigens, Lombards, Sarrazins, Turkes, and Pagans: and continuing the defence of the faith, and the victories of the Kings of France. haue left no other limits to the reputation of their valour, then those which the Sunne takes in making of his course about the earth. He beseecheth his Maiesty, to fauour the ancient priuileges of the Nobility, to recompence in them the seruices of their Predecessors: to confirme the military discipline of Kings his fore-runners, not to suffer any by fauour or purchase, to challenge the title of Gentlemen: to mainteyne the priuileges of the Knights of S. John of Ierusalem: to cut off the superfluities in Iustice: to moderate the subsidies: order the treasure, establish the Magistrate, plant discipline among fouldiars: reforme the Church, and to punish the enemies thereof. Finally he wished a thousand happines to the King, and peace to his people. But this braue and commendable humour shal not hold him long, but he shal returne to his first party, by a new defection.

The Adouocate Bernard.
Bernard Adouocate of the Parlement of Dijon, began his oration with a sollemne thanks for the Kings promise, fully to execute the Edict of the vnion: hee exhorted all the townes and subiects of the Realme, to vnitethemselves not onely in Religion, but also in good correspondency for the Kings seruice, continuation of his dignity, and defence of the Estate. He discovered all the other infirmities of this politike body, the which (besides the vicer of partialities) haue strangely corrupted: as Blasphemies, adulteries, witchcraft, Simony, outrage in fouldiars, inuention of subsidies, and newe Edicts, executors of extraordinary Commissions, Brokers, and buyers of Offices, who waste the treasure, and bring the people to beggery. An Inuective against so many Edicts registred with this Apostill: By commandements many times reiterated: seeing that in good and iust Edicts, the Soueraigne Princes command is not necessary: against the treasure ill employed, and the strange oppressions of France.

Then requiring a conclusion of the Estates, he beseeched his Maiesty to open the eyes of his wisdom, for the ease of his poore people: not to change his godly resolutions: and to dismissthe Deputies, considering the mutinies that were in their Prouinces: to go and make prooffe (said he) of the effects of their good wills. But these wills were for the most part subiect vnto those that (vnder a goodly shew of war for religion and the publike good) studied of nothing but rebellion, cruelty, treachery, trouble, and confusion.

Thus the Estates ended, and the King foreseeing the extreme oppression of his subiects, in so great a leauy of armes, abates the fourth part of their subsidies, and sent to all the Prouinces, to assure them of his good intent. But his subiects were too much affected to mutinies, too capable of disobedience, too ready to spoyle the wise and the rich. The mourning of the Duchesses of Guise, Nemours, and Montpensier, being set at libertie by the King, to binde them to bee intercessors to his mutinous people: the furious cries of Boucher, Guarin, Cuicilli, Roze, Pelletier, Guineville, Hamilton, Christin, Lucain, Maulere, Commalet, Feurderent and other such Preachers: (very firebrands of sedition) The perswasions of the Prouost of Marchants, of the Sheriffes of Paris, and other Magistrates of Townes, freely released by the King: had too wickedly seduced them. But the Duke of Mayenne arrivall at Paris, confirmed the inhabitants more in the execution of the foresaid decree of Sorbonne.

The Court of Paris.
This decree (quite contrary to those by the which this College hath so often commendably withstood the vnfit and violent proceedings of the Court of Rome, against the estate of this realme) could not take effect, whilest that maiesticall and reuerent Parliament, the true gardien of this Crowne, had eyther force or authoritie. So one of the sixtene, Bussyle Clerc a poore petty fogger, (lately much honoured, being admitted to present himselfe bare headed vpon his knee before this reuerent assembly,) followed by some of his acquaintance and companions, and a bande of armed raskalls, enters the sixteenth of Ianuary, armed with a Cuirasse, and a Pistoll

1588 where the Towne (long before corrupted by the infected humors of the League) receiued him with as great honor as they could haue done their King: and in all places where he passed, they were easily drawne into rebellion, euery Towne following themselves after the modell of Paris and Orleans.

Three thousand men sent from Paris, to succour the Cheualier d'Aumale besieged in Orleans by the Marshall of Aumont, (with the Nobilitie of the Court, some of foot and horse, and the Kings guards,) had bene defeated neere vnto Estampes, by Fargis and Montigni: but the Marshall vnderstanding of the Duke of Mayenne approach, rayseth the siege, and retires to Boisgency. In the meane time, the King himselfe in person did view and examine the conclusions of the Estates: but this his enterprise of the Dukes, made him to leaue the worke imperfect, & to provide for the safetie of his person: and for a conclusion, the fifteneenth and sixteenth of January, hee heard the Deputies greefes and complaints vpon the disorders which afflicted France.

The Estates dissolved.

The Arch-Bishop of Bourges, President for the Clergie after the Cardinals death, imputed the cause of our miseries to contempt of religion, which breaking the bonds that tie vs vnto God, had in like sort diuided the hearts and willes of families and Commonalties. The Earle of Brissac.

Charles of Cossé Earle of Brissac, chief Pantler & chief Fauconer of France, newly referred to fauour, & President for the Nobility, shewes that they be not the hands of fortune, which enuironed his Muesties forehead with this double diademe. It is God, who hath eist blessed him our King, who had before chosen him King of a more remote nation, for the pietie, faith, clemencie, and magnanimitie wherewith hee hath bene endued from his tender age. That now those vowes, fastings, teares, and toyles of the ancient French, are heard, who seemed to demand vengeance against the fire, furie, and rage of those, who (after so many religious ages) haue violated the sepulchres of their fathers and ours, and would take from amongst vs that onely religion which the holy fathers haue planted in old time throughout the world.

Then hauing represented the zeale and affection of the Nobilitie to assist the King, to restore religion, and the State to their former beautie, following the example and the hereditarie vertue of their Ancestors, who had chased and vanquished the Goths, Vandales,

A Vandales, Arriens, Albigensis, Lombards, Sarrazins, Turkes, and Pagans: and continuing the defence of the faith, and the victories of the Kings of France. haue left no other limits to the reputation of their valour, then those which the Sunne takes in making of his course about the earth. He beseecheth his Maiesty, to fauour the ancient priuileges of the Nobility, to recompence in them the seruices of their Predecessors: to confirme the military discipline of Kings his foretunners, not to suffer any by fauour or purchase, to chalenge the title of Gentlemen: to mainteyne the priuileges of the Knights of S. John of Ierusalem: to cut off the superfluities in Iustice: to moderate the subsidies: order the treasure, establish the Magistrature, plant discipline among souldiars: reforme the Church, and to punish the enemies thereof. Finally he wished a thousand happines to the King, and peace to his people. But this braue and commendable humour shal not hold him long, but he shal returne to his first party, by a new defection.

Bernard Aduocate of the Parlement of Dijon, began his oration with a sollemne thanks for the Kings promise, fully to execute the Edict of the vnion: hee exhorted all the townes and subiects of the Realme, to vnite themselves not onely in Religion, but also in good correspondency for the Kings seruice, continuation of this politike body, the which (besides the vicer of partialities) haue strangely corrupted: as Blasphemies, adulteries, witchcraft, Simony, outrage in souldiars, inuentors of subsidies, and newe Edicts, executors of extraordinary Commissions, Brokers, and buyers of Offices, who waite the treasure, and bring the people to beggery. An Inuective against so many Edicts registred with this Apostill: By commandements many times reiterated: seeing that in good and iust Edicts, the Soueraigne Princes command is not necessary: against the treasure ill employed, and the strange oppressions of France.

The Adouocate Bernard.

Then requiring a conclusion of the Estates, he beseeched his Maiesty to open the eyes of his wisdom, for the ease of his poore people: not to change his godly resolutions: and to dismisst the Deputies, considering the mutinies that were in their Prouinces: to go and make prooffe (said he) of the effects of their good wills. But these wills were for the most part subiect vnto those that (vnder a goodly shew of warre for religion and the publike good) studied of nothing but rebellion, cruelty, treachery, trouble, and confusion.

Thus the Estates ended, and the King foreseeing the extreme oppression of his subiects, in so great a leauy of armes, abates the fourth part of their subsidies, and sent to all the Prouinces, to assure them of his good intent. But his subiects were too much affected to mutinies, too capable of disobedience, too ready to spoyle the wife and the rich. The mourning of the Duchesses of Guise, Nemours, and Montpensier, being set at libertie by the King, to binde them to bee intercessors to his mutinous people: the furious cries of Boucher, Guarin, Cueilli, Roze, Pelletier, Guinea-Este, Hamilton, Christin, Lucain, Mauslers, Commolet, Feuident and other such Preachers: (very firebrands of sedition) The perswasions of the Prouost of Marchants, of the Sheriffes of Paris, and other Magistrates of Townes, freely released by the King: had too wickedly seduced them. But the Duke of Mayenne arrivall at Paris, confirmed the inhabitants more in the execution of the foresaid decree of Sorbonne.

This decree (quite contrary to those by the which this College hath so often commendably withstood the vnfit and violent proceedings of the Court of Rome, against the estate of this realme) could not take effect, whilest that maiestically and reuerent Parliament, the true gardien of this Crowne, had eyther force or authoritie. So one of the sixtene, Buffyle Clerc a poore petty fogger, (lately much honoured, being admitted to present himselfe bare headed vpon his knee before this reuerent assembly,) followed by some of his acquaintance and companions, and a bande of armed raskalls, enters the sixteeneenth of January, armed with a Cuirasse, and a Pistoll 1589. pistoll in his hand, into the great chamber, with an intent to carry away the first President de Harlay, and the other Presidents and Councillors, who persisting in the fidelity of their charge, might crosse the madde and fatall desires of the League. The whole bodie ashamed to see themselves dismembred by this insolent and presumptuous attempt, followed their head. Bussy then leads them away all, in triumph, and two prisoners to the Basilie and Louvre. Such as were Royalists were kept there, the rest (which leaned to this popular furie) preferred their houses from the spoile which this Tribune had pretended, and were sent home. Some advertised of this new Commission, saved their persons, but not the confiscation of their goods and revenues. That man was happier that found a friend where to hide himselfe, or that could get away disguised in his seruants weedes, and so march many daies on foote to recover Tours, or some other place of the Kings obedience.

All diuine and humane Lawes were subuerted, respect of equity abolished, and the reuerence of publike authority defaced. The officers of the Parliament being misguided, giue the place of the first President to Barnabé Brisson: then they make a declaration in manner of another, for the entertaynement of the vnion. The Princes of Lorraine and many gentlemen sweare vnto it, the sixteene subscribe it, one amongst them prick himselfe in the arme, to signe it with his owne blood: but remayning lame thereby, he was mockt by his Companions.

A generall
the vnion.

The people made a generall Councell of the vnion, consisting of fortie choicemen of the three Estates, the which was confirmed by the Parliament, to dispose of the publike affaires, and to conferre with the Prouinces and townes of the League. For the Church, Breze Bishop of Meaux, Rozé Bishop of Senlis, Villars Bishop of Agen, Pruost Curat of Saint Seuerin, Boucher Curate of S. Bennet, Aubry Curate of S. Andrews, Pelletier Curate of S. James, Pigenat Curat of Saint Nicholas, Lainoy Chanoine of Soissons, and sometime minister at Sedan: for the Nobility the Marquis of Canillac, the Seigneur of Menneville, Saint Pol, Rosne, Montberault, Hautefort, Sauvay for the third Estate, Massaparault, Neuilly, Coqueley, Midorge, Atchault, Baston, Marillac, Achanie, de Braye, Beaucler, Bruyere Lieutenant Ciuill, Anroux, Fontanon, Drouart, Crudé, Bordeaux, Halmeguin, Soly, Bellanger, Poncher, Senault, & Charpentier, 21 Lawyers or men of traffike.

The great men enter presently into ialousie of this number, whereas the people commanded so as, by the Dukes importunity and the aboue named Princesses, they adde vnto them Hennequin Bishop of Rennes, the Abbot of Lenoncourt, the Presidents Lainu, Fetus, le Maisre, Dormesson, Videville, d'Amours a Councillor, Jileroi, both father and sonne, Sermoise, Dampierre, la Bourdaisiere, le Fay, and many others, who to carry it away by plurality of voices, called vnto them the President le Sueur, Bragelonne Treasurer, Roland a heretic, and others, who assisting one another with their voices, ouerthrew many things which those that were deputed for the people were readie to decree, for the confirmation of their tyrannie.

Exceeding
intolerancie.

The Duke of Mayenne (to settle his affaires) suffers these base Companions to plaie the petty Kings. Those of the Clergie, exceeding the authority of the Church, do in their sermons excommunicate the father that knoweth his sonne to be the Kings seruant, and reueales him not to the Councell of the vnion: the sonne that discouers not his father, the wife and the husband that accuse not one another, the kinsmen and friends that discouer not the goods of their kindred and friends beeing absent, to be employed in the warres. The Nobility reapes some profit of the ransomes and spoiles of the Royalists and Politikes. The people condemne imprisonment, spoile and ransome, of their absolute powre, and sell the goods of any that beares not the mark of their enraged faction. This furious combustion of Paris, sets all the realme on fire. Townes and Prouinces frame themselves after the mould of the Capitall Citie. Chartres begins the dance, expells Sourd his gouernor, and receiues Reclamailie a gentleman of Beaufe, a partizan of the League. This Towne imports much for the estate of Paris, as one of their chiefe graniers for come. The Duke of Mayenne postes thither, to bee assured thereof, and the people receiue him as their redeemer.

Being

A Being arriued there, Rouan lends for him. He goes: and in all places as hee passeth, they meet him, present him their keyes, and sweare to obey him. Those of Mans murder many of the Kings officers and seruants, spoyle others, seize vpon Fargis their Gouernour, and send him prisoner to Paris. Angers was assured for the King: but the Duke of Merceur Gouernour of Brittaine, subdued in a maner all the Prouince to his partie. Thoulouse murders Duranti their first President (a man who in all the fires he had formerly kindled, did neuer shew that hee had any taste of a Huguenot in him) and Dafis the Kings Advocate. Aix, Arles and Marseilles plant vp soderly the ensieigns of the League, and followe the dance with the rest. Lion jumps with them, and growing suspicious of the passage of Colonel Alphonso Corse (now Marshall of France, vnder the title of Ornano) to command the armie in Daulphiné which the Duke of Mayenne had abandoned, they declare the occasion why they take armes, sweare to maintaine good correspondency with the Princes, gentlemen and Inhabitants of Paris, & other Townes vnto, and to put in execution all the Duke of Nemours commandements, who was now escaped out of the Castle of Blois. But we shall see this people as easie to mutine against him, as they were now readie to allow him for their Gouernour.

Chaalons retayned almost all Champaigne in their dutie and obedience. Rosne was Gouernour there. But the whole bodie of the Cittie, advertised of this great execution at Blois, let him vnderstand: That seeing the Duke of Guise his maister was dead, his authoritie was extinct, and that acknowledging no other Soueraine but the King, they would preferue their Cittie from all strange enterpriser. Langres deserues an honorable testimony, to haue lesse then all other fostered rebels, and to haue constantly opposed themselves against all the attempts of the League. In other Prouinces the Townes bandie directly one against another, and the most modest affecting neither partie, keepe themselves from the storme.

The King beholds this pittifull Tragedie, acted vpon the Theatre of his Estate, and thinkes yet to reclaim his subiects by mildnes. He pardoneth, he aboliseth, hee forgets all, so as euery one will performe the dutie of a subiect, and againe promisseth the obseruation of his Edicts of vnion, in fauour of the Catholikes, and for the extirpation of heresies. But in the end, patience prouoked, turnes into furie. Hee sees that these D Princesses, the Prouost of marchants, and the Sherifs of Paris which were dismissed, do like vnto Noes rauens, they cast oyle in stead of water vpon the fires that are kindled. Seeing therefore, the more hee seekes by mildnes to reduce these strangers to the right way, the more violent they grow in their furious passions: he now vieth his authority, he makes sundrie proclamations, as well against the Duke of Mayenne, the Duke and Cheualier of Aumale, as against the Citties of Paris, Orleans, Chartres, Rouan, Amiens, Abbeville and other adherents, pronounceth both heads and members, disloyal, rebels, guiltie & conuicted of the crimes of rebellion, treachery and treason in the highest degree: degrades them and their posteritie of all honour, if by the beginning of March they submit not themselves to his obedience. And to ioyne armes to his declarations, he makes a speedy leuie of twelue thousand Suisses, by the Lord of Sansy, who molested the Duke of Sauoye vnder the Kings authoritie, about Geneua: where hauing taken the Townes of Bonne, Gex, Thonnon and their Castels, he besieged the fort of Ripaille, where the Dukes succours led by Cont Martinengues, were defeated, Martinengues slaine in battaile, with about 2000. men, and the place yielded: in the end hee calls the Nobilitie vnto him, sends forth many Commissions to leuie soldiars, transports the execution of iustice to Tours, which was wont to bee in his Parliament at Paris: hee commands his chamber of accounts, and all his officers of the marble table, to repair presently to Tours, to attend their charges, and deprives from all honours, charges, dignities, and priuileges, all Townes adhering to these new reuolts.

F This did but kindle more the fires of rebellion. The Duke of Mayenne armes both horie and foot, practiseth without the Realme, seekes to the King of Spaine, sends out patents and Commissions vnder a new seale, vsurpes all the parts of royall Maiestie,

In deed they had need of much money, to furnish the expenses of so many petty Kings: but some filled their cofers, others payed their debts, and some bought lands and Lordshippes. Thus the people are the instruments of great men, and the selfe whereon all kind of stormes and tempests doe beate.

Libertie exceeded in all places, and rage against the Kings authoritie seemed desperate. The fire of this reuolt had kindled the heart and all the corners of the Realme: and generally there was nothing but inroads, spoiles, surprisings and sackings when as sodainly many checks amaze the League, and giue hope of a speedie reuening of the Kings affaires. The Duke of Montpensier, assisted by the Lords of Hallot, Crencaur, Bacqueville and Larchant, was in Normandie, with forces for his Maiesties seruice: and for the first fruits, hauing defeated the garrison of Falaife, taken three Captaines, cutt most of their companies in peeces, and dispersed the rest, they besieged the towne, and had brought it readie to yeeld, when as the Earle of Brissac (who of late did wonders in speaking well at the Estates in the Kings fauour) advanced with about three hundred gentlemen, and five or sixe thousand foote, whom they called Gaultiers, and made the Duke abandon the siege, to meet with them. They lodged in three villages: the Duke forceth two, kills such as make resistance, and chaife the rest with final diffcultie. The Earle flies with all his horse, leauing a thousand or twine hundred prisoners, and about threethousand slaine vpon the place, amongst the which were found many gentlemen.

After this attempt of the Duke of Mayenne, in the suburbs of Tours, the King sends the Lord of Lorges to discover the enemy: the Duke of Aumale hath intelligence thereof, and sends some troupes to charge him. The Lord of Chastillon passeth at Boisgency with two hundred horse, and as many harguebuziers, to second Lorges, and causeth Fouquerolles to aduance with twentie gentlemen towards Bonneuil. They meet with Reclainville (who commaunded in Chartres.) Hee offers to discover them, they charge him, and kill five or sixe of his men: hee retires in hast, and giues the alarm to the troupes of Picardie, led by Sauuise, and les Broses, who commaunded about 300. masters, and a good number of harguebuziers on horsebacke, and on foot. The two commanders, Chastillon and Sauuise are in front one of another. No man makes shew to recoyle, and both resolute to fight. Sauuise puts his harguebuziers before, and placeth his Lanciers in haie, approaching softly without disbanding. Chastillon disposeth of his foot, makes two battalions of his horse, and sets Charboniere and Harembure on his left hand, with their companies of light horses, and then hee aduanceth to the charge. Sauuise chargeth resolutely. His harguebuziers on horsebacke discharge very neere. Chastillons footmen receiue them in the like sort, and with one breath enter among the horse that were come to the charge: they kill many horses with their swords, and loose but three souldiars. Sauuise chargeth the light horsemen vpon his right hand, and breaking the first ranks, had vnhorsed Chastillon, and some eight or tenne gentlemen, but with the losse of five and twentie horse, as these rise and fight on foote, Harembure and Fouquerolles comes in: they charge Sauuise and his men, kill about sixefcore gentlemen, ouerthrowe the rest, and force through them. Thus broken, without meanes to make a new head, every man flies, every one placeth his safetie in the heeles of his horse. Chastillon goes to horsebacke, and pursues, chasing, beating, and killing about threescore more in the flight, with all their harguebuziers. Two Cornets were gotten, and fortie gentlemen taken, most being hurt in the conflict. Sauuise carried to Boisgency, died there of his wounds, not able to bee perswaded by any meanes to acknowledge the King, or scarce to aske God forgiveness.

Senlis had of late dayes, by the meanes of some good inhabitants, shaken off the yoke of the League. It was a troublesome thorne in the Parisians fecte, being distant but one small dayes iourney to come from their Cittie towards Picardie. To

A To pull it out, the Duke of Aumale goes from Paris, with some troupes of Balagny, Chamois, Tremont, Congis, Menneville, and an armie of the inhabitants chosen out of every quarter: he besiegeth, batters it, and makes a breache, but is repulsed from the assault.

Now they aduise the besieged to provide for their safeties: when as the Duke of Longueville appeared, being followed by the Lords of Humieres, Bonnivet, la Noue, Guiry, and other Commanders, the Duke of Aumale turnes head, and prepares to fight: but la Noue (whome the King had especially commaunded to assist the Duke of Longueville with Councill in matters of warre) did so wisely make choise of the houre and oportunitie to charge, as the Duke of Aumale, Balagni Gouverneur of Cambray, and the rest (putting in practise the vie of their long spurred owels, lately inuented as a mourn-full prediction to the League) saued their persons by the swiftnes of their horses, and leitt the field died with the bloud of fiftene hundred slaine vpon the place: in the flight and poursuit, verifying the saying: He that flies betimes, may fight againe. Chamois, Menneville and diuers others could not runne fast enough. The artillerie, baggage, and many prisoners remained at the victors discretion, who by the Kings commaundement went to receiue the army of strangers which were come to the frontiers.

Of the Duke
of Aumale
at Senlis.

The Kings meaning was to subdue Paris. The greatest of the Hidraes heads being cut off, did weaken the whole bodie, and gaue hope to his Maiestie by that meanes to find what hee had lost, the loue and obedience of his subiects. To this end hee sends the Duke of Espernon, to take from the Parisians the commodities about the riuier, and assembles his forces to compassse them in beneath. Thus the warre growes hot. The Nobilitie goes to horse on all sides, to reuenge the wrong done vnto the King: but the more his troups increased, the more bitter his subiects grew against him.

No prosperitie is so great, but it hath some crosses. As the King attends the forces which the Prince of Dombes (now Duke of Montpensier) brings him from Tours, newes comes that the Earle of Soissons (whome he had sent to commaund in Brittanie) had bene defeated at Chasteaugiron three Leagues from Rennes, and led prisoner with the Earle of Anaouour, and many other Lords to Nantes: That the Duke of Mayenne had taken Alençon. That the Lord of Albigni (a younger brother to the house of Gordes, and a partisan of the Leagues) had chased the Colonel Alphonso out of Grenoble, and seized on the Towne. The taking of these Earles caused the King to send the Prince Dombes thither, who more happily reduced many places to his Maiesties obedience. The happie successe of the Kings affaires made men to iudge, that the League would soone be ruined, the Kings armie increasing hourly. Three hundred horse of la Chastre (who presently after the Tragedie of Blois had made shew to iustifie himselfe vnto the King for the strict familiaritie hee had with the Duke of Guise) were defeated by the Duke of Montbazon, and the Marquis of Nesle his Lieutenant, and fittie of his companie slaine: the taking of Largeau, Pluuiers, Januville, and Estampes, terrified the Parisians. They call backe the Duke of Mayenne: and he finding the Duke of Longueville farre off, goes into Brie, assures some places, and takes Montreau-faut-yonne, by composition from the Duke of Espernon: but the Kings approach carried him suddenly to Paris, where (suffering his troups to liue at discretion, in the suburbs) hee caused an ill impression to grow in some which could not well digest this confusion in the State.

Losses for the King.

Townes
taken.

An armie of about twentie thousand men, gathered together by the Duke of Longueville, ioyning with the Suisses & Langueuets of Sanst, & Pontoise returned to the Kings obedience: soone after the Kings arrivall, all the Kings forces ioyned in one bodie being about fortie thousand men, lodged about Paris: and the taking of Saint Cloud, made the Parisians readie to yeeld: when as a deuillish monke, an excrement of hell, a Iacobin by profession, James Clement, of the age of two or three and twentie yeares, vowed (saide hee) to kill the Tyrant, and to deliuer the holy Cittie besieged by Sennacherib. Thus resolved, hee imparts his damnable proiect to Doctor Bourgoing Prior of his Couent, to father Commalet and other Iesuits, and to the heads of the League, to the desseine: they promise him Abbaies and Bishopricks: and if he chance to be made a Martir, no lesse then a place in heauen, about the Apostles. They caused the Preachers to perswade the people to patience seauen or eight dayes: for before the ende of the weeke, they should see a notable accident, which should set all the people at liberty. The Preachers of Orleans, Rouen and Amiens, clatter out the like at the same time, and in the same termes.

The first of August, the Monke goes out of Paris, and marcheth toward Saint Cloud: vpon his departure, they take about two hundred of the chiefe Cittizens and others prysoners, whome they knewe to haue goods, friends and credit with the Kings partie, as a precaution to redeeme that cursed murder, in case he were taken before B or after the deed. Being arriued at Gondyes house, where the King lodged, he goes to la Guesle the Kings Proctor generall in his Court of Parliament at Paris, and saies, that he had brought some matter of importance, which might not be imparted to other but to his Maiesty, and had letters of credit from the first President. The King (who for the reuerence he bare vnto Church men, gaue free access vnto such, as vnder the habit of religion made shew to bee deuoted vnto the seruice of God,) commands hee should bee brought into his Chamber, willing the Lord of Bellegarde, and the said Proctor generall to retire, who were then alone nere the King: hoping, both by the quality of the person whome he did counterfeite, (whose long imprisonment in the Bastille had giuen sufficient testimony of his faith, and integrity to his Maiestie) and C the simple demonstration of the Wolfe disguised into a Lambe, to learne some secret matter of importance; and receiues this counterfet letter from him. The King did no sooner begin to reade it, but this wretch seeing himselfe alone, growes resolute, and drawing a Knife out of his sleue, made of purpose, thrusts his Maiestie into the botome of the bellie, and there leaues the knife in the wound. The King drawes it forth, and with some struing of the Monke, strikes him about the eye. Many ranne in at this noyse, and in the heate of choller killing this monster of men, preuented the true discouery of this enterprise, and the authors thereof, worthie to be noted with a perpetuall blot of disloyaltie and treason.

The Physicians held the wound curable: and the same day the King did write of D this attempt, and of his hope of recovery, to the gouernors of Prouinces, to forraine Princes, and to his friends and confederates. But fealing that the King of Kings had otherwise determined of his life, hee did first comfort himselfe, in foreseeing that the last houre of his crosses should be the first of his felicities: then lamenting his good and faithfull seruants, who suruiuing should finde no respect with those whose munes had bene so abandoned to mischiefe, as neyther the feare of God, nor the dignity of his person could dissuade them from this horrible sacrilege. Onething (saied hee) *doth comfort mee, that I reade, in your faces, with the griefe of your hearts, and the sor-rowe of your soules, a goodly and commendable resolution, to continue united for the preseruation of that which remaines whole of my Estate, and the reuenge which on one vnthe punishment of my enemies vnto God. I haue learned in his schoole to forgive them, as I do with al m heart. But as I am chiefly bound to procure peace, and reast vnto this realme, I coniure you all, by that inuisible faith which you owe vnto your Countrie, that you continue firme and constant defenders of the common libertie, and that you neuer laye

Thus spake Henry, euen as the last pangs of death carried him within few houres after from this vnto an other world: but (a notable circumstance) in the same chamber where the Councell was held on that fatall day of Saint Bartlemew, in the yeare 1572. By his death hee extinguished the second parcell of the third race of Capets, in the branch of Valois, leauing the Crowne to the third roiall branch of the Bourbons, wherevnto the order of the fundamentall Law did lawfully call him.

A mild and tractable Prince, courteous, wittie, eloquent, and graue, but of easie accesse, deuout, louing learning, aduancing good witts, a bountifull rewarder of men of merit, desirous to reforme the abuses of his officers, a friend to peace, and capable of counsell, but weak and yeelding in aduersities, and by that meane making his enemies ouer-bold in their ambitious desseins. Finally a Prince who deserved to be placed amongst the worthiest of this Monarchie, if voluptuousnes, luxury, & excessive prodigalitie to some of his fauorites (the which might without enuie haue bene diuided amongst many men of honour;) had not made him negligent and careless of the politike gouernment of his estate, and so blemished the

HENRY

BEhold the Theatre of mans life: diuers passions appeare in diuers acts. But sorrow yeeldes to ioy, and happines chaſeth away heauineſſe. God gouernes the being of this world by ſeaſons. Men reape not before they haue ſowed, neither doe they ſowe before they haue laboured. Thus he gouerns the ſociety of mankind by certaine degrees; that man may know, that he deſerues not the ſweet, that hath not taſted of the ſowre: and that the force of his wit can no waye aduance the happy ſucceſſe of his Eſtate, without the helpe and grace of that great Gardien, who by miraculous meanes preſerues Eſtates from apparent ruine.

B This reigne hath two parcells. The begining is painefull, full of croſſes, and con-fuſed: vntill that our Henry (ſolemnly installed) be acknowledged lawfull King, by all his ſubiects: for till then, the moſt impudent and paſſionate, called him the Barnors in France. others more modeſt, left him his firſt title of King of Nauarre, or at the leaſt, of Prince of Bearne. But the ſucceſſe wil teach vs, that euen now the Lord

C Doubtleſſe, we muſt confeſſe without flattery, that France had neede of this Prince, to roote out (like an other French Hercules) thoſe hideous monſters which made it

1589 chief of the Nobility: lets them vnderstand the deceased Kings will, touching religion, by a generall or nationall Councell, whereof he protests to followe the instruction. I giue leaue, said he, to all such as would leaue mee, so to doe. Yet I am sorry they are no better Frenchmen, for their owne good and safety. I haue friends enough to cast out them, to mainteine my authority. God hath neuer left mee, and will not now abandon mee. He hath not begun this so miraculous a worke, to leaue it vnperfect, for my sake alone, but for his owne names sake: and for so many soules affected in this Realme, whome I desire, and promise by the faith of a King, to releue, to more as God shall giue mee the meanes. But how grievous is this to mee, that am your lawfull King, and who leaue you in the liberty of your religion, to see you go about to force mee to yours, by vnlawfull meanes, and without forme or instruction.

This declaration reteyned them that were least scrupulous in their duties: and his promise not to alter any thing in religion, might haue shaken many of the League. To crosse him, the Duke of Mayenne, publisheth an Ediēt of the 5. of August, in the name and the Councells, of the holy vnion established at Paris, attending a generall Assembly of the Estates of the Realme, to vnite (said he) all Frenchmen that were good Christians, for the defence and preservation of the Catholike, Apostolike, & Romish Church, and the mainteynance of the royall Estate, in the absence of their lawfull King Charles the 10. of that name. For whose liberty, he inuited them all to armes. But he desired no more the liberty of his pretended King, then our Henry did to force C religion, the support whereof serues them for a goodly cloake.

decrees.

Some Parlements growe ielous of these sodaine changes in the State, and seeme to entertaine the people in doubt and feare of the subuersion of their religion. That of Bordeaux commaunds all men vnder their Iurisdiction, by a decree of the 19. of August, to obserue inuiolable the Ediēt of vnion to the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church: and declarations were thereupon made. That of Tholouse is more violent. They decree, that yeerely the first day of August, they should make processions and publike prayers, for the benefites they had receiued that day, in the miraculous and fearefull death of Henry the third, whereby Paris was deliued, and other Townes of the Realme: forbidding all persons to acknowledge Henry of Fourbon, the pretended King of Nauarre, for King: declaring him incapable euer to succcede to the Crowne of France, by reason (said the decree) of the notorious and manifest crimes conteyned at large in the bull of excommunication of Pope Sixtus the 5. Without doubt the authority of the Soueraigne court, is much blemished in pronouncing a decree which they must reuoke by a contrary sentence.

The King
raileth his leage from Paris.

Thus the League kindled anewe the fires which the seege of Paris had somewhat quenched: the Kings troups decreased hourly, sickness diminished their numbers and the Duke of Mayenne increased. The King therefore diuides his army into three: one vnder the command of the Duke of Longueville, into Picardy: the other into Champagne vnder the Marshall d'Aumont: and he is aduised to passe himselfe into Normandy, with twelue hundred horse, three thousand French foote, and two regiments of Suisses, as well to receiue succours out of England, as to assure some places & passages fit for his desires, but with direction to ioyne at neede.

His conquests

In his passage, he causeth the Kings body to bee conducted and left at Compiègne, and reduceth to his obedience, Ateulan, Gisors, and Clermont: he receiues from Capitaine Roulet both the place and the hearts of the inhabitants of Pont de l'Arche, foure leagues from Rouan, a passage very commodious for the traffike betwixt Rouan and Paris. He visits Depe, confirms the towne of Caen, forceth Neufchâtel to yeeld, hauing by Hallot and Guitry his Lieutenants ouercome the succours that were sent thither, and slaine seuen or eight hundred men vpon the place.

The Duke of Mayenne follows.

All these surprises could not draw the Duke of Mayenne out off the walles of Paris. But when as he sees the King lodged at Dernetal, a league from Rouan, and the Towne of Eu vpon Bethune brought to his obedience: at the instant request of the Duke

A Duke of Aumale, and the Earle of Eriffac commanding within Rouan: hee goes to field, with about three thousand horse and fiteene thousand foote, French, Germanes, Italians, Flemings and Spaniards. He promisseth the Parisians to pursue, beseege, take and bring the Bearnois prisoner, and makes them all readie by supposition to hire shoppes and windowes in Saint Anthonies streete, to see him passe in chaines vnto the Bastille. Hee passeth the riuer of Seine with this mightie armie, and recouers Courmay (being lately taken by the Duke of Longueville) Neufchâtel and Eu, and then hee aduanceth to stay the course of the Kings prosperity, who triumphed in Normandie.

This proceeding made the King imagin, they should not part without blowes, and full of that generosity, constancy, and readie resolution which hee did alwaies carrie in accidents which did seeme dangerous, sends for his Lieutenants, the Duke of Longueville and the Marshall d'Aumont, to approche, for that he foresces a dangerous fit in the estate which was very sicke. The King parts from Diepe, and marcheth towards the Duke: he lodgeth at Arques, three miles from thence, betwixt two hills diuided by the riuer of Bethune: at the foote of the one is the village, and the Castell which commandeth it. He vewes the situation, and finds it fit to receiue the enemy. And not to loose the aduantage which time or industry might giue him, he casts vp a trench of seauen or eight foote deepe, on the toppe of one of the hills: rayseth the defences, furnisheth it with artillery, and foure companies of Suisses: prouides for the safety of the village, casts vp trenches vpon the weakest places of approach: and a thousand paces off nere to the riuer side, where the enemies should passe, hee lodgeth eight hundred French Harguebusiers in an hospitall, to cut off the enemies passage.

The King
marcheth towards him.

The Duke (whose army was nowe thirty thousand men) chooseth rather to leaue the shortest way, then to fight for this passage: and passing the riuer about, hee incampes on the other hill right against Arques, and three daies after, the 16. of September, marcheth against the Pollet, a suburbe of Diepe, where the Lord of Chastillon did fortifie, leauing some number of horse, and troups of foote, to garde his hill, and lodging of Martinglise.

There is no such policy as to strike first, and to charge the enemy while hee consuls, being irresolute whether hee shall fight or retire. The King knowes it well: his owne experience hath often tryed it. Hee therefore sends to vewe this army, to discover their forces, and to obserue their countenance. He leaues the Marshall of Biron to command at Arques, & lodgeth in a mill, which they had intrenched vpon the approach to this suburbe. There they make a furious skirmish. But the Leaguers hauing lost nine or ten Captaines, and a great number of their most resolute soldiers, they had no will to proceed. They leaue the place, & lodge at the nereest village to the suburbs of Diepe: an open place, without defence, or houses. So many discōmodities were scarce tollerable. Chastillon also dislodged them soone, and made them to seeke another quater.

Notable exploits at Arques against the League.

E On the other side, the Corps de gard lodged in the guest-house, would not suffer the enemy which kept both the hill & the lodging, to approach nere the riuer side. Being impatient then to haue such vigilant neighbours, they resolute to charge this Corps de garde, and to become masters of either banke, that they might approach more freely to the trenches at Arques. The Marshall sees them come, & drawing them on by light skirmishes, makes the beleue they shall haue the better: but suddenly with a furious charge he scatters them, some here, some there: & many seeking to saue thescues fro the fight drowne in the riuer. So this army is charged in three places at one instant: at the mill, by the King: at Martinglise by Biron, and at the Pollet by Chastillon. These first amazements whet their courages. They are not danted for this first check. Battailes are variable, & it may bee, a second attempt wil giue them a more happy successe. Being thus resolute, the Duke leaues that great dessein he had vpon Diepe, and propounds to set vpon the guest-house. Three or foure volles of four Canon (said he) wil beat it down. They shot, but preuaile nothing: and seeing their attempts vaine, they leaue force to flee to surprises.

The 21. of September they passe the water in the night, without drum, without trumpet and without light, they put themselves in battaile, and meane at the breake of day to worke some great effect.

But they haue a vigilant enemy, who will see all, knowe all, and do all: the King causeth a long trench to bee drawne from the topp of his hill vnto the guest-house, and mans it with foure compaines of Suisses and Lansquenets, and some French, supported by the Earle of Anuergne, (who in this warre gaue braue and singular proofes of his valour) commanding three compaines of light horse, and three other compaines of men at armes, seconded also by the compaines of the Princes of Condé, and Conoy, and on the topp of the trench hee placeth the Marshall of Biron with the compaines of Chastillon, and of Maligny, (afterwards Vidame of Chartres), and a good number of the Nobility.

All these compaines march by the fauours of the Cannon, (which played from the Castell to their aduantage) and charge the Duke of Mayenne's corner, ouerthrowes Sagonne with some horse-men dead vpon the place, and disperse the rest. But a newe supplie forceth them to retire. The Suisses of Colonnell Galatti stay their violence. The Lansquenets of the League (degenerating from the ancient constancy of the Germanes), approach neere the trench, but seeing themselves weake, and engaged with the hazard of their liues, they make offer to yeeld vnto the King. Those within the trench giue them their hands to receiue them. The King seeing them ioynd with his men, runnes to charge them, not knowing they had called vpon his name. But seeing his Maiestie, they yeeld themselves, and lay downe their weapons. He receiues them, and assures them of the pay they had gotten in fighting against him. Seeing themselves freed from danger, and the King, Biron and the other troupes of horse, fighting heere and there, and that the bodie of the Dukes horse aduanced to charge the Suisses, they turne their armes against them which had newly giuen them life: charge the Marshall of Biron's troupe, make them abandon the trench: become masters thereof, spoile all the Kings soldiars, take the Enseignes of his Maiesties Suisses & Lansquenets, and deliuer this trench vnto the Leaguers: but they shall not long enioye it.

Treachery of the Lansquenets of the League.

For the King seeing that the treachery of these villaines had made the issue of the combat doubtful, (seconded by the Duke of Montpensier and his Corner, and reinforced with five hundred shot led by the Lord of Chastillon) hee comes furiously to charge, imbues his sword with the blood of many of them, takes many prisoners, drives them out of the trench, and presently plant two Cannons there, which shot into the battayllion of the enemies Suisses that made the retreat, and strikes such a terror among them, as in short time all leaue him: the place of battaile, being couered with the carcasses of his rebells.

A third charge.

Doublelesse this ipittle-house should bee honored with an eternall triumphe. It is the place where they thought to haue driuen the King into an extremity, cyther to suffer himselfe to be taken at Diepe, or to seeke his safety beyond the seas. It is the place where the veins of the League being opened, they poured forth streames of that blood and vigour which maintayned their first ioylity. It is the place where five hundred horse, twelue hundred French foote, and two thousand Suisses, had as it were prodigiously triumphed over thirtiethousand men, who with a giantlike brauery, boasted to bring cyther dead or bound hands and feete, the greatest King, the greatest Captaine of the world, who like a lightning finding nothing that might withstand the furie of his victorious armes, dispersed and suppressed with the point of his sword, the presumptuous and rash attempts of his malicious subiects.

The King approaches to Paris.

The Earle of Blain (one of their Marshalls of the field) was taken prisoner: many soldiars, but a greater number of men at armes: many Gentlemen, and more Commanders serued as a prey to the birdes of the aire, and the beastes of the fields. The King lost the Earle of Rouffy, sixe or seauen Gentlemen, and some soldiars.

Some few dayes after, the King doubting his troupes (being but small) might be beaten from their lodging at Argues, he abandoned that quarter, and lodged them nere vnto Diepe vnder the fauour of the Castle. The Duke of Mayenne finding that lodging abandoned, passeth with his whole armie vnto the other side of the Towne, within halfe a mile: he plants sixe Canons, and about midnight shootes into the port of the Towne, to keepe them from issuing forth. The King vpon this alarm, cast vp a trauers before the port, to blind their sight, and sends speedily into England, cast vp the forces which he expected from the Queene, the which were 4000. men, vnder the command of the Lord Willowbie. But some few dayes after (these troupes being ready to land) the Duke of Mayenne (seeing all his attempts prooue vaine) dislodgeth, and thinkes he hath done much for his reputation, if (by some volee of Canon, where the King was, and then against Argues) hee publisheth throughout all France, that he is maister of those Townes, without entering. In the end, toiled with the Kings continuall skirmishes, and toucht with apprehension at the first newes, he hearing of the Earle of Soissons approach, (who had cunningly escaped out of prison) of the Duke of Longueuills, and the Marshall D'Aumonts with their troupes, he went to seeke his safetie beyond the riuer of Somme. To assure (sayd he) those places which by the treatie of Arras he was to deliuer vnto the Spaniard, and then returning to Paris, did nothing memorable, but established his Councell of sixteene, and forty, the which afterwards he reuoked and disannulled all he could, as wee shall see in the course of the Historie.

In the meane time (to busie the Parisiens), those three Enseignes which the treacherous Lansquenets had by a traitorous stratagem stolne in the Trenches, brought forth twenty other counterfeits, which the Dowager of Montpensier sister to the Duke of Mayenne, caused to be made at Paris in the Lombards streete. This was a patterne of the subtil deuises of that woman, who euery morning suborning some new poste made him to go forth at one gate, and to enter at an other, as bringing still some aduertisement of happy successe, which she sent vnto the Curats to deliuer in their Sermons. And by these politike stratagems, entertained the people in their disorder, and sleeved the purfes of the most credulous.

The Dukes retreat made the King suspect, that hee retired for an aduantage, and that marching to defeat the supplies that came vnto him, he would retorne, putt vp with greater courage, and new hopes. His Maiestie therefore leaues the Marshall of Biron at Diepe with the armie, and resolues to goe meete the Earle and the rest with foure hundred horse. Being ioynd, he takes the Towne and Castell of Gamache, and recouers the Towne of Eu. This bayte might haue drawne the Duke; but hee found his aboad in Picardie more safe, and La Fere which hee deliuered into the Strangers and enemies hands, made him continue the intelligences hee had with the Duke of Parma, whereof wee shall shortly see strange effects. So the King returning to Diepe, provided for the affaires of Normandie, leauing the Duke of Montpensier there, with the forces hee had brought for his Lieutenant generall: hee receiued from the Queene of England foure thousand men, money, and munition belonging vnto warre.

With this supply his Maiestie parts the 21. of October, and alwayes coasting the enemy, comes to passe the riuer of Seine at Meulan, and marcheth directly to Paris, with a double desseigne, cyther to fight, or at the least to drawe the Duke out of Picardie. The last of October hee arriveth about Paris, and diuides his troupes into three battallions. The first had foure thousand English, two regiments of French, and one of the Suisses, vnder the command of the Marshall of Biron, for the suburbs of Saint Marcell, and Saint Marcell. The second was of ten regiments of French, and Strangers committed to the Marshall D'Aumont, for Saint James and Saint Michell. The third, ten Regiments of French, one of Lansquenets, and one of Suisses, commanded by Chastillon and La Noue, for Saint Germaine, Bussey, and Nesle. Hee giues to cyther of these troupes a good number of Gentlemen on foote well armed, to support Hee causeth the Trenches and Rampars without the Towne to be viewed, and the next day by the Sunne rising, hee sets vpon them, and forceth them in lesse then an houre: seauen or eight hundred souldiers slaine in the streetes, thirteene peeces of Cannon carried away, foureteene Enseignes taken, and much spoile gotten, did verifie the saying: That all comes to one end to him that can attend. Here Chastillon did not forget to inuite his friends to reuenge the blood so vnworthily spilt at those bloudie Parisien mattins, but by the effusion of his owne blood, who now suffers for others.

taken.

At this new and sudden terror of the Parisiens, the Duke of Mayenne passeth to the Citie with the greatest part of the armie. His Maiestie (to see if he would fall forth) presents himselfe the second and third day following, in the suburbs, and without the suburbs, in view of the Citie, and then afterwards towards Linas vnder Montleher: but all was in vaine. Thus being content to haue taught the Parisiens, that hee wanted no meanes to punish them, but desired rather to reduce them to obedience by mildnesse, the King went and tooke the Towne and Castell of Eslampes, where Clermont of Lodesue, with about three score Gentlemen or more, had shutt vpon himselfe vpon the Duke of Mayennes worde, to vngage him with all the rest of his armie.

Here the Queene Dowager sent a petition to his Maiestie, beseeching him to do iustice of that cruell and execrable murther committed on the person of the deceased King her husband. The King sent this petition to the Court of Parliament, removed to Tours, to the end that his Maiesties Proctor generall requiring it, they should frame inditeiments against such as were held culpable, protesting neyther to spare care nor force, to take that iust reuenge which reason and his dutie required. Doubtlesse the horror of this sacrilege had so wonderfully moued some of the officers of the Court, as, if they had bene beleueed, the order of the Jacobins had by dectee bene rooted out of France, their couent at Paris pulled downe, and a piler set vp as a perpetuall monument, and the hangmen of France should haue bene afterwards attired like Jacobins. The Queene Dowager hath long pursued the rooting out of them. But the memory of Ancestors is venerable, and their Sepulchres religious. Seuentene Princes and Princesses of the house of Bourbon, buried in the monasterie of the Jacobins at Paris, haue chiefly preferred and kept the order and their couents.

new conquests.

The King seeing that by no meanes hee could drawe forth his enemies, hee sends backe the Duke of Longueville and La Noue, to refresh themselves with their forces in Picardy, Giury, into Brie, and passing farther into Beauisse, takes Janville by composition, then from Chasteaudun he sends to inuest Vendosme, his ancient patrie. Maille Benchard commanded about foure hundred men of garison, and eight hundred Townesmen armed against their Soueraigne and lawfull Lord. The Artillerie had no sooner made a hoale of foure paces wide, but the Souldiers impatient flies to the assault, takes the Castle, and so enters the Towne pel mel with the garrison, so as his Maiestie seeing himselfe in lesse then halfe an houre in possession both of Towne and Castle, gaue the inhabitants their liues, but the Souldiers the spoile.

The treacherous part of Benchard to the great Councell, (as wee haue sayd,) with the treachery of a vassall and subiect, and the seditious preachings of Jesse the Friar, were the cause that these two principall motiues of rebellion suffered for the people: the one beheaded vpon the pauement, and the other hanged. Lauerdon, Montoire, Montrichard, and Chasteau du Loir, became wise by the example of Vendosme, and opened their gates to the Marshall of Biron, who entred into the Towne with all his companie very peaceably,

The

1589. The King seeing himselfe neere vnto Tours, goes thither: the people receiue him, the 21. of the moneth with an admirable shew of ioy, he giuing the same day audience to the Ambassador of Venice, who in the name of the Seigneury, congratulates his Maiesties happy comming to the crowne; with offer of seruice and loue to the King, and crowne of France. Beaulse, Dunois and Vendosme, being subdued, the Kings army marcheth into Maine: the Earle of Brissac vnderooke to succour Mans, which the King threatned: to that intent he aduanceth with two regiments, & some horse to Larrie Bernard: but terrified with the noyse of the Canon, he returns, and contenting himselfe with a pillage of forty horse, & some baggage of his Maiesties Reisires which he met by chance, he proclaimes his victories at Paris.

Pois-Dauphin commanded in Mans, accompanied with a hundred Gentlemen, and twenty Enseignes on foote, who in shewe would die with their armes in their hands, rather then suffer the King to enter. But must they cause the people to spend a hundred and fifty thousand Crownes to fortifie the Towne and suburbs? burne so many houses without the town, to yeeld it at the third vole of the cannon? Learne oh yee people, that great men play with you, as with a tennis ball: and be not wedded to any other party, but that of your Souereigne and lawfull Prince. You run rashly into a bad action: they fortifie you at your owne charge, and you are the meanes to vndermine your selues.

The taking hereof, caused the Castles of Beaumont and Touteuoyes to yeeld, with the Townes of Sablé, Lanai, Chasteaugonthier, Mayenne, Alanson, Falaise and many others in the Prouinces of Touraine, Aniou, Mayne, Perche, and Normandy. So as in lesse then two moneths, his maiestie marched with his army (furnished with many cannons, and a great number of Strangers, English, Suisses, and Germains) about eight score leagues, hauing atchieued many memorable seeges, taken foureteene or fiftene good townes, assured many Prouinces: and in all places as hee passed, Hee came, he saw, and ouertame.

Thus our Conquerour made the round of a third part of his Realme, not finding any let to stay the course of his prosperities: when as the Court of Parliament at Rouen, no lesse violent and presumptuous then that of Thoulouse, pronounceth them guilty of treason both against God and man, & the Estate and crowne of France, that had opposed themselves against the holy viſion: and all Royallists and their successors deprived of all prerogatives of Nobility, their offices to be voided, and not to be recovered: them as vnworthy to possesse any offices, benefices, or dignities, and all their goods forfeited. These armes were too weak to terrifie his maiesties tenants: this decree did little aduance the League. And the Duke of Mayenne (seeing the King farre off, partly through shame, partly through despayre, and importuned by the Parisiens) was constrained to pacifie their exclamations by some great exploit. But the taking of Bois de Vincennes and Pontoise ended all his Conquests.

decree.

So many new triumphs did wonderfully amaze the Leaguers: the people grewe weary with the burthen of imposts, the spoyle of souldiers, and a thousand calamities that did oppress them. To mainteyne them in the gulf of this confusion, the malicious and corrupt tongues of the Preachers charmed the blind with an impression of many intelligences both within and without the Realme, by the hope of a speedy and great succour from Spaine, by the publication of many libells, which they continually vied as firebrandes to feede this combustion, and by counterfeiting they made the Kings name and his actions very hatefull vnto the people.

In the meane time, continued the course of his victories in base Normandy. Where, hauing taken Honfleur a Port Towne, hee came and raised the Fort of Ardenne, where the Duke of Mayenne had lien fiftene daies, being distant from Honfleur about thirtie leagues, where he offered him battell. The advantage being as many in number as the King) could not draw him to it.

The treacherous part of Benehard to the great Councell, (as wee haue sayd,) with the treachery of a vassall and subiect, and the seditious preachings of Iesse the Friar, were the cause that these two principall motiues of rebellion suffered for the people: the one beheaded vpon the pauement, and the other hanged. Lauerdin, Montoire, Montriehard, and Chasteau du Loir, became wise by the example of Vendosme, and opened their gates to the Marshall of Biron, who entred into the Towne with all his companie very peaceably.

The

A The King seeing himselfe neere vnto Tours, goes thither: the people receiue him, the 21. of the moneth with an admirable shew of ioy, he giuing the same day audience to the Ambassador of Venice, who in the name of the Seignemy, congratulates his Maiesties happy coming to the crowne; with offer of seruice and loue to the King, and crowne of France. Beauisse, Dunois and Vendosme, being subdued, the Kings army marcheth into Maine: the Earle of Erissac undertooke to succour Mans, which the King threatned: to that intent he aduanceth with two regiments, & some horse to la Ferle Bernard: but terrified with the waye of the Canon, he returnes, and contenting himselfe with a pillage of forty horse, & some baggage of his Maiesties Reisires which he met by chance, he proclaimes his victories at Paris.

E Bois-Dauphin commanded in Mans, accompanied with a hundred Gentlemen, and twenty Enseignes on foote, who in shewe would die with their armes in their hands, rather then suffer the King to enter. But must they cause the people to spend a hundred and fifty thousand Crownes to fortifie the Towne and suburbes? burne so many houses without the town, to yeeld it at the third vole of the cannon? Learne oh yee people, that great men play with you, as with a tenise ball: and be not wedded to any other party, but that of your Soueraigne and lawfull Prince. You run rashly into a bad action: they fortifie you at your owne charge, and you are the meanes to vndermine yourselves.

C The taking hereof, caused the Castles of Beaumont and Toutenoyes to yeeld, with the Townes of Sablé, Lauak, Chasteaugonthier, Mayenne, Alançon, Falaise and many others in the Prouinces of Touraine, Anjou, Mayne, Perche, and Normandy. So as in lesse then twomoneths, his maiestie marched with his army (furnished with many cannons, and a great number of Strangers, English, Suisses, and Germaines) about eight score leagues, hauing atchieued many memorable seeges, taken foureteene or fiftene good townes, assured many Prouinces: and in all places as hee passed, Hee came, he saw, and ouertame.

Thus our Conquerour made the round of a third part of his Realme, not finding any let to stay the course of his prosperities: when as the Court of Parlement at Rouen made lesse violent and presumptuous then that of Thoulouse, pronounceth them guilty of treason both against God and man, & the Estate and crowne of France, that had opposed themselves against the holy union: and all Royallists and their successors deprived of all prerogatives of Nobility, their offices to be voided, and not to be recovered: them as vnworthy to possesse any offices, benches, or dignities, and all their goods forfeited. These armes were too weak to terrifie his maiesties tenants: this decree did little aduance the League. And the Duke of Mayenne (seeing the King farre off, partly through shame, partly through despair, and importuned by the Parisiens) was constrained to pacifie their exclamations by some great exploit: But the taking of Bois de Vincennes and Pontoise ended all his Conquests.

E So many new triumphs did wonderfully amaze the Leaguers: the people grewe weary with the burthen of imposts, the spoyle of souldiers, and a thousand calamities that did oppresse them. To mainteyne them in the gulfes of this confusion, the mutinous and corrupt tongues of the Preachers charmed the blind with an impression of many intelligences both within and without the Realme, by the hope of a speedy and great succour from Spaine, by the publication of many libells, which were continually vied as firebrandes to feede this combustion, and by counterfeiting they made the Kings name and his actions very hatefull vnto the people.

The King in the meane time, continued the course of his victories in base Normandy, where, hauing taken Honfleur a Port Towne, hee came and raised the Siege of Meulan, where the Duke of Mayenne had lien fiftene daies, being distant from Honfleur about thirtie leagues, where he offered him battell. The advantage being twice as many in number as the King) could not draw him to it.

The

1590. the memory of Arques was yet too fresh, and the supply of fiftene hundred Lances, and five hundred Harguebuziers which the Duke of Parma sent him, vnder the command of the Count Egmont, made him forbear. Whilest the Duke goes to ioyne with his Strangers, the King takes Nonancourt, and then besiegeth Dreux.

Dreux.

In the beginning of Marche, the Duke turnes head towards Mantes, to passe the riuier eight Leagues from Dreux. His Maiestie hath intelligence thereof, and giues him leaue to approach within two Leagues. To giue and winne a battaile is indifferent vnto him. Hee causeth his Armie to march towards Nonancourt, to view the foard of the riuier of Eure, which runnes there: hee himselfe treads out the place of battaile: he imparts it to the Duke Montpensier, the Marshalls of Biron and Aumont, to the Baron of Biron Marshall of the field, and to the chiefe Captaines of his armie: he makes choise of the Lord of Vieq for Sergeant Maior of the field: he appointed the Rendezvous for his troupes, at the village of Saint Andrew, foure Leagues from Nonancourt, vpon the way to Tury, and the place of battaile in a great plaine neere vnto it. All these old Souldiars found the place chosen with so great iudgment and military wisdom, as they altered not any thing.

The King hauing deliuered it vnto the Baron, to appoint euery man his place; sayd: It is no desire of glory, nor motion of ambition, nor appetite of reuenge, that makes mee resolute to this combat, but the extreame necessitie of my iust and naturall defense, the pity of my peoples calamitie, and the preservation of my Crowne. Let vs all refer the event of this enterprise, to the eternall providence. Then afterwards, lifting vp his eyes to heauen: Thou knowest O God (sayd he) the secret of my thoughts. I beseech thee put me not in the number of those Princes, whom thou hast forsaken in thy wrath, but of those whom thou hast chosen to repaire the ruines of a desolate Estate, and to releue my miserable people oppressed with the violence of warre. O Lord I yeeld my selfe to the disposition of thy holye and infallible will, and desire not to liue, not to raigne, but so farre forth as my life may be to the aduancement and glory of thy name, and my authoritie the raisine of vertues, and the banishment of vices. These and such like religious words, moued all the Campe to prayers and workes of piety, euery one according to his deuotion. This done, the King disposeth his armie according to the plotte which hee had layd. Hee diuides it into seuen esquadrons, and in euery one three hundred horse, flanked on eyther side with footmen: the first hee giues to the Marshall D'Aumont, with two regiments of French: The second to the Duke Montpensier, with five hundred Lanquenets, and a Regiment of Swisses. The third to the Earle of Auvergne and Guiry, eyther of them commanding a troupe of light horse, and on their left hand foure Canons and two Culuerins: The fourth to the Baron of Biron. In the fift were five ranks of horse, and sixe score in fronte, Princes, Earles, Barons, Officers of the Crowne, Knights of the Order, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the chiefe families of France, besides those which the Prince of Contie and La Guishe, great Maister of the Artillerie brought that day. His Maiestie was in the head of this troupe, shining in his armes, like the Sunne amidst the seuen Planets: hauing on the side of E him two battailes of Swisses, with the regiments of his gardes of Brigneux, of Vignoles and Saint Iohn. The sixt to the Marshall of Biron, with two regiments of French: The teuenth were about two hundred and fiftie Reisfres. These Squadrons were all in a front, but somewhat bending at the ends, in forme of a Cressent. There was nothing more terrible, then to see two thousand French Gentlemen armed from the head to the foote.

The Duke of Mayenne appeared a farre off, and had taken a Village betwixt both armies: but his Maiestie forceth them to dislodge, and wearies them with skirmishes, to drawe them to fight: and the approaching night leaues our warriors burning with desire, to haue the day call them to the field, to make prooffe of their seruice and duties to their King and Countrey. At the breake of day, the men at armes were in their Squadrons, the Souldiars in their Battaillons, and by nine of

At the clocke euery man did fight in his gesture, in his threats and words. At the same instant the enemy shewes a bodie of about foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foote, and almost in the same forme, but most glistering, with more fethers, more men, and lesse courage, almost like a Cressent. The Dukes Comet was about two hundred and fiftie horse, augmented with the like number by the Duke of Nemours, who ioyned with him: and was almost in the midst of his esquadrons as that of the Kings, but flanked with two Squadrons of Lancers that came out of the Lowe Countries, who were about eightene hundred horse, marching all together. On the side were two regiments of Swisses covered with French foote, then two lesse Squadrons of Lances, seauen hundred on the right hand, and five hundred on the left, two Culuerins, and two bastards.

The sunne and the winde might haue greatly amazed the Kings army. To prevent this inconuenience, his Maiestie aduanceth about a hundred and fifty paces, gets both the sunne and the winde, and finds the enemies number greater then he esteemed. But this multitude serues as a spurre to euery Capitaine to encourage both himselfe and his men. The King goes to the head of his Squadron, beginnes his first worke by praier, exhorts all the rest to do the like, passeth from Squadron to Squadron, animates, exhorts and encourages them with a Countenance full of Maiesty, ioye and constancie. Mariauault arriues and giues him intelligence, that the Lords of Humières, and Mouy, are within two thousand paces of the field. But the King had well obserued the point of his happinesse, and will not giue his enemy that honour, to strike the first stroke. He that beginnes well, hath halfe ended; saith the prouerbe. Hee commandeth La Guishe to discharge his Cannon. It perceth through the thickest Squadrons of the enemies, and shoots nyne voltes before theirs could beginne: five or sixe hundred light horse, French, Italians and Wallons, aduance with a full carrier, to charge the Marshall D'Aumont on the one side, on the other side their Reisfres charge the Kings light horse. The Marshall ioynes with them, and makes them turne their tayles presently: their groue of Reisfres is so violently repulsed and driuen backe, as they turne sodenly to rallie themselves behinde the other troupes. An other Squadron of Lancers, Wallons and Flemings, (seeing his Maiesties troupe separated some-what from the rest which the Reisfres had charged) come hotly vpon them. The Baron of Biron makes it good, and not able to charge them in the front, takes them behinde, perceth a part of them: the rest breaketh away like a billowe against a rocke, The Baron had two wounds, one in the arme and the other in the face.

The first charge.

A second charge.

Nowe comes the Duke of Mayenne with his bodie of horse-men, in the which were the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale, having vpon their wings foure hundred Carabins, (which were Harguebuziers on horse-backe, armed with murrions and plaistrons) who make a furious fallie five and twentie paces off vpon his Maiesty troupe. This done, the King parts like a violent lightning from the head of his Squadron, beeing sixe hundred horse, hee chargeth two thousand of the enemies: hee beakes them, scatters them, and is so engaged among the thickest of them, as (notwithstanding the great plume in his Caske, and that in his horse head which made him apparent) hee remayned a good quarter of an houre vnkowne euen to his owne people, in this great forest of Lances, amidst a great shower of strokes, giuing a good testimony, that if before he could do the office of a great King and Capitaine in ordering, so could hee now performe the dutie of a braue soldiar, and resolute man at armes in fighting.

A blowdie charge.

But aboue all, of a most milde and mercifull Conqueror: who in this bloudie fight, did sound forth that gracious speech. Save the French, and downe with the stranger. Doublesse hee is well kept, whome God keepes. Some were greatly astonished and amazed: others trembled and quaked, hauing lost the sight of the Kings Maiesty. This great bodie, whose foundation was so much shaken, beganne to wauer: those who euen now presented their faces so 1589. furiously with the points of their Lances and swords, do now shew their heeles, cast away their armes, and trust to their horses. His Maiestie being freed from this perill, having with twelue or fifteene in his company, taken three Corners, and slaine the Wallons that did accompanie them, and returning to his Squadron a triumphing Conquerour, he filled the armie with exceeding ioy, and the armie the ayre, with their louing crye of, God save the King.

one, that owe,

The Swisses remainyng yet whole, but abandoned of all their horse, and layed open. They propound to send the French foot on the right hand, who had not yet fought, to breake them. But the respect of the ancient alliance of that nation with this Crowne, made the King to graunt them life, and receive them vnto mercie. Laying downe their armes, they passed to his Maiesties side, and those French that were with them, moved the like clemencie. But the time his Maiestie lost in pardoning the Swisses, did greatly fauour their retreat that fled, gaue the Duke of Mayenne leisure to paide the river of Eure, to breake the bridge after him, and to recouer Mante in safetie. The Marshall of Biron stood firme without flincking, yet did he more terrifie the enemye then any other: for seeing this troupe of rescue whole, they supposed that this old fouldlar having bin practised in so many battailes in his life time, would easily breake them, and make the victory absolute. Hereupon the Marshall d' Aumont, the Earle of Clermont, the Baron of Biron, and other Commaunders, returne from the chase, gather together their troupes, and ioyne with the King. And the King having received his forces that came out of Normandie, makes a bodie, leaues the Marshall of Biron with the armie to follow him, sends the Earle of Auvergne before, takes the Baron of Biron on his right hand, and an other troupe on his left: and accompanied with the Prince of Conty, Duke of Montpensier, Earle Saint Paul, Marshall d' Aumont, the Lord of Tremouille, and many others, pursued the point of his victorie, chasing, bearing, and killing, vntill that the broken bridge (diuerting them a League and a halfe out off the way, to passe at the foard of Anet, and the horses (whose legges the Reisires had cut to stoppe the way) hindring the ponsure, and the approaching night, ended the victorie.

Loss of the Leaguers.

The disorder was great in the retreat of the vanquished, and the slaughter great in the fury of the fight: about fixe hundred horse were slaine or drowned, and about foure hundred prisoners. The Count Egmont, the yong Earle of Brunswike, Chastellain, and a great number of other Noblemen slaine, Bois-Dauphin, Meslaur, Cigogne (who carried the white Corner to the Duke of Mayenne) Fontaine Martel, Louchamp, Lodouan, Falandre, Hengueffan: the Marshalls of the field, Trenay, Castelliere, Dijon, and many other French, Germisines, Spaniards, Italians, and Flemings were prisoners, whereof the most part being graciously released, did afterwards abuse the Kings bounty by a reuolt, whomeuer could practise that vnciuill maxime of State, a dead man neuer makes warre. There were twentie Corners taken, the white Corner, the great standard of the Generall of the Spaniards and Flemings, the Corners of the Colonnell of the Reisires, three score ensignes of foot of diuers nations, and the foure and twentie of Swisses which yeilded. All the footmen which yeilded not, or were not drowned, were cut in peeces. All their artillery, all their baggage carried away. Such as fled into the woods found lesse mercie in the peasants, then in the men of warre. The Duke of Mayenne saved himselfe in Mante, and gaue the Townesmen this flout for their comfort, that the Bearnois were still one, or little better. The Duke of Nemours, Bassompierre, the Vicont of Taunnes, Rufne and some others tooke the way of Chartres. To conclude, his Maiestie pourses them almost to the gates of Mante, finding the wayes (notwithstanding his lets) full of runners away which remainyng at his discretion. And if those of Mante resisting in their first resolution, to keepe their gates shut, had not yeilded to the Dukes earnest request, both hee and all his followers had fallen into the victors hands. Thus God poured out his wrath vpon this armie: thus a handfull of men defeated many Leaguions: thus the French spoyled Perou euen in France. On the Kings side were slaine Clermont of Entragues Captaine of his Maiesties guards, Tieb, Schemberg Colonnell of the Reisires, fighting then vnder the white Corner, Loncaulnay of Normandie,

Amandie, being three score and twelue yeares olde (an honorable graue for that braue olde man) Crenay Corner to the Duke of Montpensier, Fesquiers, and at the most twenty Gentlemen more. The Marquis of Nesle being hurt, died within egiu daies after. The Earle of Choisy, the Earle of Luden d' O, Montlucet, Lauergne, Refuy and some others were lightly hurt.

5590

In this battaile they obserue three chiefe things. The first the Kings firme resolution to giue battaile, with an assured confidence, that the sincerity of his intent, and the equity of his cause should bee fauored with the assistance of heauen. The second, that at the very instant of the fight it seemed that the earth did bring forth armed men for his seruice: for on the eue and the day of battaile, there came about fixe hundred horses vnto him vnexpected. The third, that of two thousand French Gentlemen, only twelue hundred did fight: twelue hundred put to rout an army of foure thousand horse, fresh, well mounted, & well armed, and twelue thousand foote. Without doubt the Eternall God of armes doth neuer forget the right of Princes, against their rebellious subiects: and a braue resolution, with a wise commaunde giues a happie ende to battailes.

Conquests
after the victory.

This victory purchaseth Vernon and Mante vnto the King, two principall bridges vpon the riuer of Seine. And the heauens seemed to poure more blessings vpon our Henry, and to make his way easie to an absolute Royaltie: for the Earle of Rendun (chiefe of the League in Auvergne,) was the same daie of the battaile of Yury, shamefully chased from the siege of Issire, slaine in battaile, his troupe cut in peeces and his artillery taken, by the Lords of Curton, Rosignat and Chastillon.

Another
battaile, vnto
the League.

As they had abused the Mantois with a vaine assurance of his death, whome they durst not looke vpon nor incounter. so with the like practises they must delude the Parisens. The Duke of Mayenne, his sister of Montpensier, and the other heads of the League, deceiued of hopes, published by printed bookes, That at the first assault at Dreux, the Bearnois had lost about fixe hundred men, that their wounds had made a greater number vnfit for their armes: That the Marshall of Biron was wounded vnto death. That in another encounter neere vnto Poissy the Vision had gotten a great victory. That in the battaile of Yury, the combate had beene long, and the losse almost equall. That if the Bearnois beene not dead, hee is little better. But such as (glad to haue saved themselves,) came to Paris, marred all, in verifying the Contrary: making the people to hang downe their heads, and to wish for peace by a still and mournfull muttering. The fire brands of hell in their pulpits made the losse farre lesse then it was, giuing them an assured hope of speedie and newe succors from Spaine, for the restoring of their Estate and the destruction of the Maheustres. so they then called such as did fight vnder the Kings Ensignes.

To that ende the Duke of Mayenne went into Flanders, to the Duke of Parma: that Eisto say, hee went to ruine his honour and reputation, for being a master at home among his owne countrymen, hee went to make himselfe a seruant and slaue to an ambitious proud man, who hath often made him attend at his gate, and lacquay after him, before hee could receiue an answer of any matter of small importance: to the great grieve an disdain of the French Gentlemen, that did accompanie him. Doubtlesse it was necessary the Duke should trie the insolvency of strangers, the better to know the courtresie of the French, and submit his armes and person to the King his soueraigne and lawfull Lord: the means whereby hereafter hee shall abolish the memory of things past.

Aduersity makes the wilfull more obstinate. The Court of Parliament at Rouen, for execution of the former decree, puts to death the sequenth of Aprill, some prisoners the Kings seruants: and three daies after they declare all those persons guilty of high treason to God and man, that followed the King of Nauarre, (so speake the decree,) and would not yeeld to King Charles the tenth of that 1590 that name, joyne with the Vnion, and carrie armes vnder the Duke of Mayenne. Who left these threaten by their decree, and the Duke goes to beg releefe, the King being at Mantua laboured to reduce the Parisiens to reason by mildnes. But these trumpets of sedition, imputing this delay to want of courage, perswaded the people, that though their sworne enemy should haue worke mough, and that at length he should be beaten, that a little patience would giue them a great victorie: that they must not yeeld in any article whatsoeuer: making impudent allusions to the name of his familie, who is now seated in the throne of this monarchie.

Seige of Paris.

These insolent exclamations brought the King about Paris. Paris is accustomed to liue from hand to mouth: the benefit of the Hales, the Place Maubert, and other market places, is the cause that the most part of households doe not knowe what provision means. And the cheefe of the League had to setle this former beleefe in the Citizens minds, as of a hundred, fourescore and nineteene had neglected to provide for things necessarie to endure the toyle of a seige. So as the taking of Ante, Poissy, Pontcharenton, Corbeil, Meulan, Montreuil vpon Seine, and Logny vpon Marne, brought Paris in few moneths to extreame necessitie. Compiègne, Creil, and Beaumont kept the river of Oise.

Erronious decision of Sorbonne.

But the ordinarie cries of the Preachers: the practises of the cheefe, and the Ladies of the League, and the erroneous decision of the facultie of Sorbonne, giuen the seventh of May in the third generall congregation, held to that end in the great hall of the sayd College, prohibiting all Catholikes according to the law of God, sayd they, to receiue for King an heretike or fauor of heretikes, relaps & excommunicate, although he do afterwards obtaine by an outward iudgement absolution of his crimes and Censures, if there remaine any doubt of dissembling, treacherie, or subuersion of the Catholike religion. Condemning all them for heretikes, forsakers of religion, and pernicious to the church, that should suffer any such to come to the crowne. All these made the multitude more oblitate against the extreamest miseries which the rigour of a long and painful seige may cause. Besides this decision, they had yet stronger restraints to bridle mens tongues & actions that fauoured the flower de Liz in their hearts. The sixteene set spies to obserue the speeches and countenances of such as they suspect: that is to say, of such as wish for peace, and haue not lost the remembrance of the true Princes of France. And if any one chance to say, It were good to treat of a peace. He is a politike: he is a Royalist, that is to say, an heretike, and enemy to the Church. They spoyle, imprison, yea put to death, such as doe not applaud this horrible tyrannie.

Miseries of the Parisiens.

The Duke of Nemours, in the Duke his brothers absence commaunded at Paris, and for his cheefe Councillors he had, the Popes Legat, the Ambassador of Spaine, the Archbishop of Lyon, the Bishops of Paris, Rennes, Plaisance, Senlis and others. Panigraue, Bishop of Ast, Bellarmin and Tyccus Iesuits, who with diuerse precessions, fasting, vowes and supplications, bewitched the people in their greatest famine: many zealous doctors, Curats, Preests, and Monks tooke armes, and the friars with their breuiaries in open musters were admired by some, and laughed at by others. The Cheualier d' Aumale, with some others, laboured by sallies to annoy the kings troupes, who content to repulse them, hoped their bellies would shortly make their tongues to sing a new note. The Duke of Mayenne on the other side courted the Parmesans: and the King of Spaine proceeded so slowly in his succours, as the best iudgements did perceiue, he rather sought to entertaine, then to quench their thirst.

The Parisiens in the same time had leisure to sharpen, but not to satisfie their appetite. The Corne and other provision of the publike, was wasted the first moneth. Such as had any provision in their houses, kept it very secret, and others that trusted too confidently to the words of the cheefe Commanders and Preachers, perished of hunger, or at the least indured much, striving against the crueltie of famine. All passages by water were cut off, the taking of Saint Denis deprived them of the plenty of France, & but for the passports (which a little fauour or money obtained easily of the Captaines and

A and gards) the Cittizens had in few weekes beene brought to the Kings discretion, 1590 who yeelded good for euill, suffered them to carrie victuals for the Duke of Nemours, and others who practised his ruine.

Their miserie grew extreame in the third moneth of the seige. There were a hundred thousand people dead of hunger, greefe, and pouertie, in the streets and hospitals, without releefe, and without pittie. The suburbs ruined, beaten downe, and wast. The Cittie needie and solitarie. The rents of the Towne-house (being the cheefe liuings of many families) were extinguished: their lands about the Cittie wasted and desolate, the vniuersity forsaken, or serving to lodge peasants, and the scholes for stables for their cattle. The Pallace not frequented; but by some idle persons, the grass growing where as before they could hardly go for presse. The shops either without workemen, or without trafficke. No corne, no wine, no wood, no haie vpon the riuier. Nothing passed but were subiect to the garrisons of Saint Denis, the sort of Gournay, Charenton and Corbeil. The Halls were emptie, no marchants in market places, no meanes to make money, nor to get meate. To conclude, see this Queene of Citties, this little world, this Paris without peere; wast, desolate, and at the last gaspe, and (to augment the disorder) many relikes were eaten, the Jewels and the Crowne of ancient Kings molten, and for a peece of bread, many wiues and virgins do willingly abandon their bodies, and their honours to the souldiars.

But all these miseries and horrors cannot moue these hard harted Pharises. The sixteene, the fortie, and the cheefe of the faction, bewitch the people, as it were with a sleeping potion which benums the members, to cut them off by peccemeale when they bee asleepe, that hauing sucked the blood, the heat, and the hearts out of their bodies, (as they haue done the silver out off their purses) they might confirme their insolent tyrannie, without controull. They force the Parliament (being subiect to the houses of Spaine and Lorraine,) to publish a decree the fifteenth of Iune, forbidding all men to speake of any composition with Henry of Bourbon, but to oppose themselves by all meanes, yea with the effusion of their blood. And the Preachers did still feede them with hope of a speedie deliuerie.

But the bellie hath no cares: the people are not fed with paper, or with the Duke of Mayennes promises, nor with his trumpets. They haue already eaten dogges, cats, horses, asses, moyles, heibes, roots, and anything that might quench the rage of famine in such extreame dispaire. They come tumultuously to the Councell assembled in the pallace, to require a peace. They provide for this mutinie by a fillic reliefe of eight or tenne dayes. At the end whereof a great number appeare armed in the same place, and demaund peace or bread. Le Gois, a Captaine in the Towne, steps forth to feed these famished people with words, but no bread, and for his reward hee was wounded in the shoulder with a sword, whereof hee died within few dayes after. The Chaulier d' Aumale flies thither, and followed by a troupe of men at his deuotion, shuts the Pallace gates, imprisons them that were armed, and hangs two out of the whole multitude, to suppress the like fits of this dispaireing people. These popular mutinies had confounded the cheefe Leaguers, if they had not prevented it. To this end, they assemble with the cheefe of the Cittie, and notwithstanding the decision of the Sorbonne, and the decree of the Court, they resolute to send the Archbishop of Lyon, and the Bishop of Paris to the Kings Maiestie, to seeke some meanes of pacification.

A mutinie of the people.

Before they part, they will haue leave from the Legat, lest they incurre some Ecclesiasticall censure. The Legat consults with Panigraue, Bellarmin, and Tyccus, whether the Parisiens did fall into excommunication, being forced by the famine to submit to an heretike Prince. If the Deputies going to such a Prince, to convert him, or to better the Estate of the Catholike Church, were comprehended in the excommunication of the Bull of Pope Sixtus the first. The Doctors answer no.

Thus the Deputies come to the king, to Saint Anthones in the field. The King hears their speech, tending to a generall peace for the Realme, or a particular for Paris, if the Deputies sent to the King.

1590 the Duke of Mayenne will not seeke a Generall. But what can they hope to obtaine of A a King of France and of Nauarre, treating with him but with the simple qualitie of King of Nauarre?

answere to the Deputies.

Your Councell (said his Maiestie) contradicts it selfe, demanding peace of him, whome they will acknowledge but for a King of Nauarre. I will, and desire peace, to ease my people: but not according to your propositions. I loue the Cittie of Paris as my eldest daughter, and will doe her more good then shee requires, so as she be thankfull vnto mee, and not to the Duke of Mayenne, nor to the King of Spaine. The brute of the Spanish succours for Paris doe not amaze mee. I know the practises of Spaine, and with the helpe of heauen will conuert them into smoke. Paris and the Realme of France are not fit for King Philips mouth. I will giue the Parisiens eigh dayes to consider of their yeelding, and of the articles of peace for the whole B realm. Vpon their refusall, I know well how to use a Conquerors right against the cheefe mo-tiues & fauours of rebellion. The constancie of them of Sancerre: the dispaire and victory of the Gantois, whereby you magnifiethem of Paris, is impertinent: for those of Sancerre were prest to these extremities by the violences of such as would take from them their goods and liberties, their religion & liues. Contrariwise I will giue the Parisiens life, which Mendoza the Ambassador of Spaine takes from them by famine. As for religio, informe your selues of these Princes and Noblemen Catholikes, if I do force their consciences in the exercise of their religio, or otherwise. The comparison with them of Gant is not good. The Parisiens haue sufficiently shewed their courage, in suffering their suburbs to be taken. I haue five thousand Gentlemen with me, who will not be intreated after the Gantois maner. I haue likewise God, and the C equitie of my cause. Make a faithfull report of my words to them that haue sent you.

With this answer, & other speeches testifying the Kings good meaning, & the smal feare he had of the League, these Deputies go to the Duke of Mayenne: and hee sends them backe to the King, and giues great hope to incline to a peace. But, Be not amazed at this treatie (said he to the Parisiens, by a Secretary of his, going after the Deputies) I will rather die then make a peace. And being aduertised, that Paris would shortly be forced through want to yeeld vnto the King. The taking thereof (answered he) shall be preiudiciall vnto him: this conquest shall disperse his armie, and then we shall preuaile easily.
But his Maiestie would neither see, nor suffer the ruine of his capital Cittie: and his meaning was not to seize vpon Paris in such sort as his enemies supposed. It grieved him D to see so many ill aduised people. And if the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma, coming to succour them, would hazard a battaile, he hoped by their ouerthrowe to bring the Pa-risiens vnto reason.

goes aginst his enemies.

Thus the Duke thought to abuse the King with deuises, and vnder a colour of treatie win time, in fauour of the beleeged. But the King being aduertised, that the Duke of Mayenne was parted from Bruxelles, and tooke the way to Paris, followed by Balagny, Capitaine Saint Paul and other troupes, his Maiestie aduanceth with a troupe of horse, and marcheth seuentene Leagues, to incounter him: and missing them but one houre, he forceth them to flie into Laon. The Duke fortifies himselfe there with his forces, and approaching vnto Meaux, he giues a generall hope of a battile. The King E goes againe towards him: but hee finds the Duke fortified betwixt two riuers, attending the Duke of Parmas comming, who being come, renues this first hope, and with this dessemel he goes to lodge at Claye and Fresnes, sixe Leagues from Paris. The King raiseth the seerge, comes to meet him, appoints the Rendezuous for his armie. The next day, the thirteenth of August, on the plaine of Bondy in the way to his enemies, he chaseth their quarter masters from Chelles, who began to marke out their lodging, and forceth a troupe of eight hundred horse to retire into the bodie of their armie.

Paris raised.

The King
offers battaile

The first of September, the Kings armie is in battaile about the village of Chelles, about five thousand horse, in the which were sixe Princes, two Marshalls of France, many Noblemen, more commaundets, more great Captaines then are in all the rest of F the world, foure thousand French Gentlemen (whom the bare shew of a combat doth draw more cheerefully to the place of battaile, then to a gallant wedding) & eightene thousand foote French and strangers. The Duke of Parma standing vpon a hill to

A view them. Be these (sayd hee to the Duke of Mayenne) the tenne thousand men, which 1590 you assured mee would be so easily overcome? there appears above five and twentie thousand in the best order that I haue seene. This Duke made more account to saue one of his men, then to kill ten of his enemies. So resoluing not to hazard anything, they change their Swords and Lances, into shouels and Pikeaxes, and intrenching themselues in the Fenne, auoyded the danger, and preserved his armie: and neither could skirmishes nor alarmes make him abandon his trenches.

On the eighth day of the moneth, the mist was great, and the winde being contra-rie, carried away the noise of the enemies Canon. The Dukes laying holde of this occasion, make a bridge of Boates, besiege Lagny vpon Marne, a weake Towne, lying behinde their backs, and halfe a mile from their Campe: they batter it, and take it by force, but not without an honourable and vertuous resistance of three hundred men, that kept it, but holding it not gardable they razed it. To drawe them out of their Forte, his Maiestie makes shew of a great enterprise against Paris: he makes Lagny taken his desseigne knowne; that hee will attempt it by scaladoc: and the tenth daye at night goes from the Campe with a good troupe. But they keepe themselves within the Fenne, yet could they not long subsist in this straight, where they endured all want: and hungar in the end would driue the Woolfe out of the wood. The King offered them battaile in vaine: hee attended the tryall of the Dukes forces in vaine. (Hee therefore mans those places hee held about Paris, sends backe some of his troupes into Touraine, Normandie, Champagne and Bourgogne, and retaines a sufficient armie to annoy his enemies.)

This proceeding drawes the Dukes to field, to free Paris. Parma calles himselfe a redeemer: and to make his profit of this aduantage, hee besiegeth and taketh Corbeil by force, and kills all that hee findes in armes. Rigaude (a braue and valiant Captaine) commanded there, and hauing no time to fortifie against so great a power, hee found there his honourable Sepulcher. For dying at the breach, hee performed the dutie of a faithfull and valiant seruant to the King. But the Parmesan lost the Marquis of Renty, with a great number of men, blemished his reputation, and weakened his armie: for whilst that he wastes time, the King makes new desseignes, which shall bring the League into greater difficulties.

Euenthen the Agents of Philip would haue filled his good Cittie of Paris (for the Spaniard called it) with numbers of Spaniards and Walons. But on the one side the plague was great, and vctually very skant: and on the other side, the forces of Maurice Earle of Nassau preuailed in the Lowe Countries: the Queene of England sending great succours thither. And the sixtene of Paris seeing themselves at some more libertie, thanked the Duke of Parma, giuing him to vnderstand, that his abode at Bruxelles, would be more pleasing and more safe for him. His armie de-cayed visibly: hee sees himselfe in the midst of an inconstant multitude, and to dis-member his forces, to leaue any with the Parisiens, were to loose them, to drawe the King vpon him, and to be in danger of an ouerthrowe. So in the end of Nouember he gathers together his troupes, and makes his retreat, being pursued, tyred, and beaten with dayly losse, euent to the frontiers of Arthois, by the King, the Dukes of Neuers and Longueuille, by the Baron of Biron, Ciury, Parabell, and others. To teach Strangers, that France cannot be taken nor ruined, but by it selfe.

Parma retreats.

Hee had no sooner turned his backe, but Corbeil and other small places held by them, returned to the Kings obedience: the garrisons placed there by them, repayed the French blood lately shed at the taking thereof: and Paris fell againe into new confusions and like necessitie. The Duke of Mayenne was greatly troubled to assist the Parmesan in his retreat. During the which, the Marshall of Biron tooke Cler-mont Beauchassin for his Maiestie, five or sixe other Townes, and twentie Fortes or Castles, possessed by the enemy. The Duke of Parma being out of the Realme, the King made his entrie into Saint Quentin, being receiued with an honourable entertainment, and exceeding ioye of the Inhabitants: and the tenth of December, hee Diuers exploits.

We haue conducted a mighty enemy out off the realme: let vs now obserue some particular exploits, for which we would not interrupt the continuance of our History. The Leaguers forces consisted of men, who sought their priuate profit in the confusion of the Estate, and by consequence, wished for nothing but increase of disorders: so all their desseignes tended onely to spoile and desolation: to the preiudice of the Kings subiects, but to no aduancement of their party. In Dauphiné those of Vienne fought in the moneth of Marche, to shew some effects in fauour of the crosses of Lorraine. Those which had the Flower de Luze printed in their hearts, assure the Towne for the King. The Colonel Alphonso, and Les Diguieres go to succour them: and from thence go and take Pont of Beauuoisin, and Saint Laurence du Pont, possessed by the League.

In the meane time, the Marquis of S. Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours, hath an enterprise vpon Vienne. These two Commanders flie thither with speed, and repulse the enemy. Alphonso desires to see how he carries himselfe in his retreat, hee falls into an ambush layd by the Baron of Sencey, is taken prisoner, and payes afterwards fortie thousand Crownes for his rancome. Les diguieres tooke the Townes and Castles of Briançon and Dexilles, and entred vpon the territories of the Duke of Sauoy. Then in Nouember hee beleeged and forced Grenoble a Parliament Towne, to set vp the armes of France, and to change their affections, which inclined to the factions of Strangers. So wee may say, that Dauphiné was the first Prouince of the realme, wholly subdued to the King from the League: the which was chiefly performed by the valour and diligence of the Lord of Les Diguieres.

Gregorie the 14. a papian of Spaine.

In Normandie the Duke of Montpensier tooke Honfleur, and forced the Leaguers to leaue the field. Thus the League decreased in diuers Countries: and to giue them a mare, the King did sollicite a leuie of Reistres in Germanie, by the Viconte of Turenne. On the other side, Gregorie Sfondrate, lately installed in the Pontificall Chaire, and a Partisan of Spaine, renewed the hopes of the League, promising a succour of fiftene hundred horse, and eight thousand foote, vnder the command of Francis Sfondrate his Nephew. During these preparations, the Cheualier D'Aumale attempts vpon Saint Denis, scales the wall by night, enters the Towne without losse, and held himselfe for maister thereof, when as the Lord of Vieq, a valiant, wise, and resolute Gentleman, comes into the streete, chargeth the Knight, layes him dead vpon the place, killes most of his followers, and puts the rest to flight. This Knight was one of the chiefe of the League, violent, hardie, and valiant, but of a strange disposition, insupportable and dissolute.

The King tyred the Parisiens with continuall alarums, and new enterprises, but rather to terrifie them then to ruine them, and to giue them occasion to open their eyes, and to consider of their estate. They growe so amazed, as they wall vp Saint Honories gate, vpon an aduertisement that the Kings troupes would make some great attempt the 20. of Ianuarie. The Parisiens feare serues the Agents of Spaine for a pretext to drawe in some regiments of Spaniards and Neapolitaines, attending some greater succours from the Duke of Parma. The hope of these new succours from Spaine and Italy, serued the chiefe of that faction, as a bridle to restrain the Parisiens. But the more to incourage and content the whole body, Gregorie the 14. of that name, assisted by many Cardinalls, doth againe excommunicate the King and his adherents: hee sends a monitorie to the Cardinall of Plaisance his Legate at Paris, by Marcellin Landriano his Nuncio: and for the effect of his purposes and promises, hee begins to arme, to nourish (in steed of quenching, as the common father) the combustion of this Realme.

On the other side (the Castilian hauing priuate intelligence with the Duke of Mercour) the Spaniards land in Brittanie, and fortifie Blauet a port of the sea: and thereby

A in a manner dismember the whole Prouince, vnited to the Crowne vnder Charles the eight. The King sent la Noue to make head against them: and retyring to Senlis, hee tooke the way to Brie, accompanied by the Duke of Neuers, (who hereafter shall be of the Kings party, vpon the assurance the Cardinall of Bourbon gaue him, that hee might without scruple of conscience carry armes for his King, although of a contrary religion,) he makes a shew to beleege Prouins, Sens, or Troyes: then with a todaine change he giues out, that his meaning was to go to Tours, to redresse some disorders: but hee commands the Marshall of Biron (who returned from the conquest of Candebrce, Harsleur, Fescamp and almost Normandie, for his Maiefty, except Neue-hauen, Rouan, Pontise and two or three other places) to make a shewe to passe through Beaulse, to ioine with him, and that sodenly hee should turne and beset Chartres, before that any greater forces should enter.

Chartres was enuironed the tenth of Februaire, beleeged, battered, and assaulted, but valiantly defended almost two monethes and a halfe. La Bourdaisiere commanded there, who hauing endured some assaults, it was propounded in the Kings Councill to raise the seege: but the Earle of Chemery, lately restored to the office of Chancellor, by his Maiefty, did vehemently impugne it, hauing an especiall interest in the reduction of this towne, by reason of some lands he possessed there about: he aduiseeth the King to giue a general assault: insistes vpon the dishonor & preiudice it would bring to the Kings affaires, and the commodities hee should receiue by the taking thereof, being one of the keyes of Paris, which might greatly settie his Estate, and annoy his rebels. The Lord of Chastillon, (comming from rayling of the seege of Aubigny, which la Chastre, chiefe of the League in Berry had beleeged) promisseth the King that if hee will make him his Lieutenant on this side the riuer, hee will deliuer it into his power within eight daies. His Maiefty giues him this Commaunde. Hee makes a bridge of woode, the point whereof reached vnto the breach, that they might come couered to handie stroakes with the enemy. This newe engin amazeth them, and drawes them to composition: the which they obtained on good-friday, vpon condition to yeeld within eight daies, if they were not releued.

The Duke of Mayenne would not loose the certaine, to runne after the vncertaine. D Hee held Chasteau-Thierry so straightly begirt, as the Viconte Pinard was forced to capitulate with him before the King could come to his succour. So the King lost Chasteau-Thierry, and in exchange tooke Chartres, a goodly and strong place. There came forth about sixe hundred men with their armes, horie, and baggage, and the 19. of Aprill the King made a triumphant entry in armes, appointed a garrison, restored Sourdis to his gouernment, reduced Aulneau and Dourdan, to his obedience, and then went to refresh himselfe at Senlis.

Let vs now see for other sinister accidents, which in time shall helpe to ruine the League. A thousand horse, and eightene hundred Harguebuziers, Prouensals, Sauoyards and Spaniards, seeke to subdue that Prouince for the Duke of Sauoy. La Vallette E inuities le-Diguieres to do the King herein a notable seruice: he goes, and both ioynly charge these troupes of strangers, and bastard French, they kill foure hundred masters and fiftene hundred Harguebuziers, take many prisoners, and carrie away fiftene Enseigns, winne many hories and much baggage, and loose but one Gentleman and some twenty souldiars. This done Les Diguieres returnes into Dauphiné. Being gone, the League recouers new forces in Prouence by the fauour and credit of the Countesse of Sault: but shee had neyther force nor vigour able to countenance the factions of Spaine and Sauoye. The Duke of Sauoye, lately returned from Spaine, growes iealous of some intelligences preiudiciall to his Estate, and lets gards both ouer her and the Lord of Genes her son. She is cunning, counterfeits herselfe like, conceales her discontent, in Palov. In the end shee finds means to escape with her sonne disguised to Marceilles.

In Porton the gouernor of Loches, hauing taken the Castell of la Guterche, the Viconte of the sayd place preieth his friends, intreats the Duke of Mercour, assembles all hee can, to recouer his house. The Baron of Kochepose ioyned with some other 1591. Commanders of the Country for his Maiesties seruice, comes and chargeth the Vicomte, kills aboute three hundred gentlemen, his best footemen, & aboute seauen hundred naturall Spaniards that were come out of Brittaine, to succor the Vicomte. The Vicomte after he had maintayned a little fight, flies to a riuer by, where thinking to passe in the ferry-boate, the presse grew presently so great, as boate and passengers sunke. La Guerche with many other gentlemen slaine or drowned, did almost equall the number of the Nobility which died at Couttras.

The Popes
led.

Then the Princes, and Noblemen, Catholiks, following the King, did sollicite his Maiesty to turne to the Catholike religion, and had by the Duke of Luxembourg sought to appease the bitterness of the Court of Rome, against the estate of this realme. The Dukes returne with small hope: the petitions made vnto the King, to prouide for his dutiull subiects of both religions: to prevent the new attempts of Gregory the 14. and his adherents, to the preiudice of this Crowne, were the cause of two Edicts made at Mante in the beginning of July: the one confirmed the Edicts of pacification made by the deceased King, vpon the troubles of the realme, and disannulled all that passed in July: 1585. & 1588. in fauour of the League. The other shewed the Kings intent to maintaine the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion in France, with the ancient rights & priuileges of the French church. The Court of Parliament at Paris, resident at Tours & Chalons in Champagne, hauing verified these Edicts, did presently disannul all the Bulls of Cardinall Caietans Legation, and other Bulls come from Rome the first of March, proceedings, excommunications and fulminations, made by Marcellin Landriano, terming himselfe the Popes Nuncio, as abusive, scandalous, seditious, full of impostures, made against the holy decrees, Canonick Constitutions, approved Councells, and against the rights and liberties of the French Church. They decree, that if any had bene excommunicate by vertue of the sayd proceedings, they should be absolved: the said Bulls and all proceedings by vertue thereof burnt in the market place by the hang-man. Landriano the pretended Nuncio (come priuily into the realme without the kings leaue or biling) should bee apprehended and put into the Kings pryson, and so to proceed extraordinarylie against him. And in case he could not be taken, he should be summoned at three short daies, according to the accustomed manner, and ten thousand frankes given in reward to him that should deliuer him to the Magistrate. Prohibitions bee made to all men to receiue, retayne, conceale or lodge the sayd pretended Nuncio, vpon paine of death. And to all Clergie men, not to receiue publish or cause to be published any sentences, or proceedings coming from him, vpon paine to be punished as Traytors. They declared the Cardinalls (beeing at Rome), the Archbishops, Bishoppes and other Clergie men, which had signed, and ratified the sayd Bull of excommunication, and approved the most barbarous, abhominable and detestable Parricide trayterously committed on the person of the sayd deceased King, most Christian and most Catholike, deprived of such spirituall liuings as they held within the realme, causing the Kings Proctor generall to seize thereon, and to put them into his Maiesties hand: forbidding all persons eyther to carry or send gold to Rome, and to prouide for the disposition of benefices, vntill the King should otherwise decree.

That of Tours added this clause to their decree: they declared Gregory calling himselfe Pope the foureteenth of that name, an enemy to peace, to the vnion of the Catholike Apostolike and Romane Church, to the King and to his Estate, adhering to the conspiracy of Spaine, and a fauor of rebels, culpable of the most cruell, most inhumane, and most detestable Parricide, committed on the person of Henry the 3. of famous memory, most Christian and most Catholike.

The Parliament of the League, did afterwards condemne and cause those decrees to bee burnt at Paris, which were made against the Bulls, and ministers of the Rome. So one pulled downe what an other built vpe. During this contrariety of Parliaments, there falls out a crosse to diuide the intentions of the Spaniard, and Lorraine without the realme, and of the Dukes of Mayenne and

A and Nemours at Paris. Euery one by diuers practises affected this Crowne, and euery one tryed all his wittes to set it vpon his owne head. But these men had diuided it amongst them, giuing the rest to vnderstand, that they fedde themselves with vaine hopes. To cast more wood and oyle into the flames of their diuision, and to ruine one by another, matters were so handled, as the 15. of August, the yong Duke of Guise escaped out of prison from Tours, and not farre from the riuer, found a troupe of horle appointed by the Lord of La Chastre, to conduct him. This escape caused many bonfires, and greatly reuiued their hearts, who held this Prince fitte to make a King of the Vnion. But the cleere sighted thought with reason, that his arriual at Paris would rather ruine then aduance their partye, and the deuises and practises of other pretendants, must needs soone kindle an extreame and common ielousie amongst them.

Guise escapes.

Whilest these consult with their most trustie friends and seruants, what effects might grow by this new accident: the King in the same moneth besieged Noyon in Picardie, defeated the succours sent by the League, foure times, killed their most resolute men at armes, tooke many prisoners, put the rest to flight, and at the Duke of Mayennes nose (who to auoyde this check, which the League was like to receiue, attempted vpon Mante, sought to force his Maiesties Suisses lodged at Houdan, and approached neere to Noyon, but would not fight) heaping shame vpon his enemies: hee forced the besieged to yeeld to his obedience: and moreouer went and dared him to fight before Han.

Noyon taken by the King.

C Let vs returne into Daulphiné, to behold the most memorable, and most fatall defeat for the enemies of this Crowne, the most vertuous expedition of armes, which for these many yeares hath most broken their desseignes vpon Prouence and Daulphiné, and most weakened the League in those Prouinces, which the Sauoisien affected: Don Amado, bastard brother to the Duke of Sauoy, Don Oliuares chiefe of the Spaniards, (whom the Duke had lately obtained of King Philip his father in lawe,) the Marquis of Trevis and others, conducted twelue or thirteene thousand men, by the plaine of Pontcharra, neere to the Castle of Bayard, in the vallee of Graisinodan. Doubtlesse the place should reuiue the memory of that incomparable Knight, who by the valour of his armes, hath in former times wonderfully tyed the realme to recommend his merits: the Lord Les Diguieres meetes them, chargeth and ouercomes them, leaving two thousand five hundred slaine vpon the place, carries away many prisoners, and most of the Commanders, takes eightene Enseignes with Red Crosses, and makes bootie of all their baggage, which amounts to aboute two hundred thousand Crownes, in Chaines, Jewels, plate, money, both golde and siluer, horse and armes. Two thousand Romaines and Milanois, which had saued themselves with Conte Galeas of Bel-Ioyuse their Commander, in the Castle of Analon, were the next day at the Victors discretion: sixe or seuen hundred were cut in peeces, the rest were sent to a place of safetie, with white wands in their hands: and then sent home into Italy, with another neuer to carry armes against France.

Sauoy defeated.

D The King seeing, that neither by the taking of Noyon, nor by any other baite, hee could draw his enemies to fight, doth presse them yet more neerely. To this end hee commands, that Paris should bee restrained on all sides, both by water and land, and should enioy no commodities, but by the mercie of the neighbour garrisons (the which he entertained, vpon the tributes and customes imposed vpon victuals, which they suffered to passe to Paris: and by this meanes empied the inhabitants purses, stript them, and drew out of the Citty necessary commodities for his troopes,) then with one part of his army, hee marcheth into Normandie, surpriseth Louiers, approacheth to Rouen, to tire the inhabitants, who seemed no lesse obstinate then the Parisians. He is no sooner arriued, but they crye out for succors: and his Maiestie sees them neere their ruine, or at the least ready to yeeld to some reason.

Rouen besieged.

E So the King of Spaine solicited from many parties, and thrust on by the consideration of his owne priuate interest, and satisfaction, sends to the Duke of Parma, with commands Succoured by

Parma.

1591. commands him to leaue the gouernment of the Lowe Countries in his absence, to A the Cont Mansfield, to go and free ROUAN, and to imbrace such occasions as should be offered.

The Kings happy successe, and his enemies miseries, drawes the Prince of Parma the second time into France: hee parts from Bruxelles with foure thousand foote, and three thousand horse: and fortified with the succours of Italy, and three thousand Suisses, hee marcheth by small iourneys, for hee wisely conceiued that his Maister sent him into France for the same considerations, that hee would haue giuen him the conduct of his armie by sea into England, and vnder this shew of armes hee practised another desseigne: To cause the Estates of the League (whereof they purposed a conuocation the next yeare) to giue the Crowne of France to the Infanta of Spaine, whom B the father promised to marry with one of the heads of the partie, whome the Estates should name.

Division be-
Duke of May-enne and the sixteene.

This tended greatly to the preiudice of the Duke of Mayenne, for hee was married: and the eldest sonne of Lorraine, the Dukes of Guise and Nemours were to marry. Hee is therefore now resolutely determined to crosse the sixteene Tribunes of Paris, who with their Champions carried away the peoples voyces, and aboue all others, did feed the Spaniards hopes in this realme, to whome (incited by the gold of Pern, and his prodigall promises) they had already sold the Capitall Cittie. The sixteene growne hatefull through their tyrannous authoritie, feare to be soone suppressed: they C resolute to preuent it, and rather to vnhorse the Duke, the better to aduance their affaires according to King Phillips intentions.

One thing seemed to aduance their desseigne: they held prisoner one named Brigard a Proctor of the Towne-house, accused to haue had intelligence with the King, and of letters written to his Maiestie. Brigard escapes out of prison: They suspect the President Briffon, and the Councillors Larcher and Tardise, to haue fauoured his escape. In this furie the 15. of Nouember, they seize vpon these three venerable persons, hale them to the Chastelet, cause them to bee strangled in the close prison, and the next day, hang vp their bodyes at the Greue, with infamous writings on their breasts.

This execrable fact might haue extended farther, and made the like spectacle of D any one that should in any thing haue controuled the actions of these homicides. The Duke of Mayenne (who treated with Parma), posts to appease this tumult: hee caused Louchart, Auroux, Hameline, and Emonnot, the chiefe authors of this cursed attempt, to bee apprehended and executed in the open view of all the people, who bowed their backs mournefully, at the damnable commands of these Tribunes: hee shortned their number, weakened their authoritie, and maintained his owne as well as hee could: and to pacifie the people guiltie of this mutinie, hee published the 10. of December, an abolition of things past in this disorder. The King in the meane time made his necessary prouisions for the siege of ROUAN, and appointed his store-houses at Caen, Pont Larche, Ponteau de Mer, and other places. On the other side, the hope of E speedy succours from the Stranger, the presence of Henry of Lorraine, eldest sonne to the Duke of Mayenne, and the arriual of the Seigneur of Villars, with fixe hundred horse and twelue hundred Musketers, made the Cittizens to persist in their rebellion: and the Parliament, to forbid all men by a decree, in any sort to fauour the part of Henry of Bourbon, vpon paine of death: ordaining that the oth of the vnion made the 20. of January, in the yeare 1589. should bee monthly renewed in the generall assembly made to that effect, in the Abbay of Saint Owen, with commandment by the sayd Court to the inhabitants, to obey the Lord of Villars, Lieutenant to the sayde Henry, in all hee should command for the preseruacion of the Towne. Moreover, Bauquemare then first President, procured that all the Inhabitants should swear before La Londe Mayor of ROUAN, to reueale all such as by worde or deed should fauour the King of Nauarre, to be exemplarily punished.

Villars

A Villars hauing got footing within ROUAN, hee presently displaced his superior fortifications his authority, expells all such as hee suspected, fortified Saint Catherins mount, and did all acts of hostility against the King, annoying his army what he could, the which besides the obstinacy of the beleeged, was to encounter with the extreame rigour of the winter, sickness, and want of victualls.

But they surpassed all these difficulties cheerefully, and the beleeged were readie to yeeld: when as newes comes that the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma had taken Neufchâssell, (abandoned by the Kings garrison) and were lodged at Franque-Ville halfe a daies iourney from ROUAN. The Duke of Guise, la Chastre and Vitry his Nephew led the foreward. The Dukes of Mayenne, of Parma and Sfondrate Nephew to Gregorie the 14. the battaile. The Duke of Aumale, the Earle of Chaligny, brother to the Queene D'Angoyr, Boisdaulphin, Balagny and Saint Paul the rereward: Bassompierre and la Motte, Lorrains, led the Suisses and the artillery.

Whilest that the King made a necessary voiage to Diepe, to frustrate some intelligences of his enemies, the Marshall of Biron drawes forth seauen peeces of artillery to Bans, a village aboue Darnetall, plants them in three places, and puts himselfe in battaile, to receiue the Duke of Parma, who should come to lodge in the valley on that side, and by his countenance, made them thinke that hee had a desire to fight. The King arriues, continues in battaile almost thirtie houres, and prouokes his enemy by continuall skirmishes. But he was encountered by a cunning temporizer, who passing with his troupes wide of Darnetall, made the King to deuise a new stratagem, to C drawe him on more, and to engage him, as it happened soone after. The King dismisseth his Nobility, but with charge to be readie at the first command, and by continuall skirmishes kept ROUAN from any releefe, from the twentieth of March to the 21. of Aprill.

In the ende the Dukes of Mayenne, Guise and Parma, seize vpon Caudebce, from whence the garrison was dislodged, and the same day they come to ROUAN, but staid not many howers, neyther had they meanes to victuall it. His Maiesty seeing that ROUAN was not supplied with victualls, passeth at Pont-Larche, causeth his armie to aduance towards Fontaine le Bourg, and sends for all his garrisons of Louuiers, Mante D Meulan, Vernon, and other places nere, so as fortified with aboue three thousand horse and fixe thousand foote in lesse then fixe daies, hee turnes head towards the village of Incotot, where the Dukes of Mayenne and Guise were lodged, chargeth their foreward and defeats it quite, chaseth the Dukes aboue two leagues from Parmaes quarter, leauing their baggage and plate in the possession of la Guishe. The first of May hee takes from them an other lodging, leaues aboue fixe hundred Leaguers dead vpon the place, and looseth but fixe souldiars and eightene or twentie hurt.

Incotot.

All these checkes should drawe the Dukes to fight: but Parma seekes onely to free himselfe from the King, and the rest had no desire to make tryall of their sufficiency. They held themselues verie close intrenched and fortified within their Campe, issuing forth no more then they had lately done neere vnto Lagny. The King presseth them, and takes from them all passages both for victualls and retreat. They likewise intrench a great woode: and to stoppe the Kings approach, lodge there two thousand Spaniards and Wallons. In sight of their whole armie his Maiestie forceth this intrenchement, and (had it not bene for a small number who by great speede recovered the army,) had defeated the whole troupe.

For ten daies space the King tired them with continuall skirmishes and inroads, during the which heeviewes the situation of their Campe: the tenth of May hee made choise of such forces as hee held necessary, and by fixe of clocke in the morning chargeth a quarter which the Leaguers held to bee most safe, and without resistance, kilis about two thousand fixe hundred men vpon Sfff 4 the

To conclude, this warre brought forth nothing so memorable as that which was done at Candebee, at Iuetot and at Annale. But for a prooofe of the perpetuall assistance and fauour of heauen to our King, amidst this thundring of artillery, and so many showers of shot, his Maestie was hurt with a Harguebus in the reynes: but yet so miraculously, as the force of the bullet was spent in the emptines of the aire, and lay betwixt his armor and his backe, giuing the King this lesson by a diuine aduertisement, My Lord, busband your life more sparingly: it is necessary for your subjects. The Duke of Parma escaped not all these encounters without a musket shot in the arme: the wound did accompany him to his graue.

The King miraculously hurt.

The Dukes retreat.

Death of the Duke of Parma.

In the end blowes, hungar and extreame thirst, forced these Dukes to take their way to Paris in confusion, from whence Parma (carrying no tokens of victory) passed through Brie, recovered Arthois, and so went to refresh himselfe at Bruxelles: then in the ende of the yeare he died in Arras, as hee returned from the Spaine. His reputation beganne to decay. He had preuayled little in France, and Conte Maurice did daylie take something from him in the Lowe Countries. Hee had bene aduertised, as by a prognostication, that hauing taken the Towne of Antwerp (against the opinion of all the world) in the yeare 1585. hee should shake hands with warre. Doubtlesse this Prince should haue ended his labours by this great seruice done to King Phillip his master, as the most glorious triumph, which Spaine had of long time seene.

Death of the Marshall of Biron.

The Kings proceeding.

The Duke of Mayenne.

The Duke of Nemours.

Thus the Duke of Parma's troupes by land were weakened, and those he had imbarked were fought withall, some taken, and the rest sunke by the Hollanders. So Sfendrate came to consume his troupes in France. Thus France escaped at this time the proud threats of her ancient enemies. Roman pressed with as great necessity as before, brought corne out of Villars store-houses, at his owne price, whereby he got an infinite treasure. The King weighing well the toyle his Nobility had endured, dismissed some, and reteyned the most resolute, and to hinder the Parmaesin from attempting any thing, hee sent the Marshall of Biron to followe him at the heeles. Who loath to remaine idle, beseegeth, battereth and takes Espernay. But Espernay must be the farall place to end his labours, and by his death breake off some other desseins which his Maestie had, who to stoppe the entry of another army of Strangers (which King Phillip at the intreaty of the chiefe of the League, nothing sorry for the Duke of Parma's disgrace, whose pride they could not beare) determined to send, vnder the conduct of the yong Duke of Parma, assisted by the Duke of Feria, vntill the coming of the Arch-Duke Ernest, brother to the Emperour Rodolphus, gaue order for the most urgent affaires of his realme: hee diuided his forces into the most conuenient places, to set vpon the League, where they had greatest strength, and labored to effect some intelligences hee had within Paris. But the periode of his happinesse was not yet come.

During these practises, the Duke of Mayenne surpriseth Pontau de mer. and to get more bagges of double pistols, he treats againe with the Agents of Spaine, touching the assembly of their Estates, to make the Crowne electiue, against the fundamentall Lawe of the realme. But he had his desseine a part, and the greatest part of the Parliament was tired with this hideous confusion, vnder the which their scarlet robes could not appeere so beautifull, as vnder a stately Royalty: and the chiefe of the third Estate inclining vnto peace, abhorred these tedious furies of the League. The Duke of Nemours, for his part, layed the foundation of a pettie Monarchie at Lions, but he built it vpon the sand. He was now installed in the Towne which Maugisson had sold him treacherously (considering the shewe hee had made of faithfull seruice to the King, and the towne and Castells of Vienne in Daulphiné, the which he had received to the preiudice of the truce which was then betwixt them of Lions and Daulphiné: Being assured of these good places, hee goes to field, but with more brute then fruite: for hee did not fortifie his party, but by the taking of Saint Marcellin and Eschelles, Eschelles, places of weake resistance: and doubtlesse Belriere won more honour in the defence, then the Duke did in the conquest of the last. The Colonel Alphonso and Les Diguieres vpon assurance of the truce were farre off, the one in Prouence, the other in Languedoc, where both opposed themselves against the forces of the League. This breach recalled them soone into Daulphiné, where with their ioynt forces they recouer that which the Duke had taken, not daring to oppose himselfe.

Les Diguieres.

In the end Les Diguieres hauing thrust the Duke of Nemours out of Daulphiné, (who by fauour of the forces of Sauoye, thought to settle himselfe there) enters into Piedmont, in the moneth of September, fortifies Briqueras, batters and takes the Towne and Castell of Canours, chargeth the Dukes men at Vigon, forceth and defeats them. The Duke of Sauoye posts to Turin, and seekes to take the fort begun at Briqueras by scalado. Hee is repulst with dishonour and losse. They charge him in his retreat, but some feare of an ambush made them retire. And Les Diguieres (hauing left the Lord of Puet to command in Piedmont), returnes to Grenoble, whether the affaires of the Province did call him.

On the other side, seing the armes of Spaine had preuailed so little on the land, they must trie if some enterprise by sea would repaire their former losses. The Gouernour of Fontarabye had long practised vpon Bayonne with a Physician named Blancpignon, who had intelligence with a Spaniard that had liued long in the Towne, and vnder borrowed termes of arte, did by letters negotiate the surprise of Bayonne, and therooting out of all the Kings officers and seruants. Their treason was so well aduanced, as a meet of ships with an armie at land, was readie for the execution, when as by Gods permission La Hiliere, Gouernour of Bayonne surprised the Lacquay coming from Fontarabye with letters of credit to the Traitors, who being taken and beheaded afterwards, discovered soone the whole practise: but the Spaniard chose rather to die then to write those letters hee was required, to giue direction to the attempters, and to lay a plot for his companions. In October the Duke of Bouillon followed with foure hundred horse, & two hundred harguebusiers, before the Towne of Beaumont, defeated Amblise great Marshall of Lorraine, and Lieutenant generall to the Duke, accompanied with eight hundred horse, and two thousand foote: hee slue the Commander, and about seuen hundred others, tooke their artillerie, their ensignes, and their Cornets, sent home foure hundred Lanquenets, with white wands, and lost not one man of marke.

A small fish called Remora stayes a great shippe: so a paultrie hens roult ruines the League in Languedoc and Quercy. The Duke of Joyeuse (brother to him who died at Contras), hauing spoyled the Countrie about Montauban with six hundred masters, and foure thousand foot, French, and Lanquenets, in the end became master of Monbequin, Mombartier, Monbeton, and tooke Barte by composition: but in reuenge of foure score souldiars hee had lost before it, (contrary to his faith) hee put most of them that yeilded, to the sword. A treacherie which caused his brothers death, and for the which, the vengeance of God shall soone confound this man. The fort of Saint Maurice came in like sort into his power, and then hee beleeged Villemur. The Lord of the place called Reniers, commaunded about two hundred and fiftie souldiars, whome the Lord of Themines Senehall of Quercy (a wise and valiant gentleman) releued suddenly with fixe and fortie men, as well cuirasses, as harguebusiers, led by the Seigneur of Pedone: and then (being ioyned with the Duke of Espenon) he caused Joyeuse to raise the seige, recovered Mauzac, and some other small places thereabouts.

But whilest his troupes sleepe at their ease, after the order and manner of the French, with too great confidence and contempt of the enemy: the Duke of Joyeuse, sets vpon them with all speed in the night, kills foure hundred, hurts a great number of them, and but for the wisdom and aduise of Themines had slaine all the rest, and gotten two Cannons of Montauban. This done the Duke 1592. Duke of Espernon retires into Prouence. His brother La Valette died in February, and the Estate of Prouence required the Dukes presence being Gouverneur. Joyeuse takes hold of this occasion, and the tenth of September returns and camps before Villemur. Reiners commits the place to the Baron of Mauzac, to Chambert and La Chaze, valiant and valiant Commanders in warre: and goes himselfe to gather together some forces at Montauban. The seigneur of Desme, is happily there with some forces, & without any stay puts himselfe into Villemur. Joyeuse made his battery of eight Cannons, and two Culverins, when as Themines accompanied with fixe score maisters, and two hundred hargue-bushers marcheth courageously to succour them, causeth his horsemen to light, and sends their horses safely backe to Montauban, and so with great devotie, thrusts himselfe into Villemur. And in good time, for the next day, the twentieth of September, Joyeuse gave a sharpe assault: but it was valiantly defended, with great losse to the enemye. At the same instant Themines gives an alarm with foure Trumpets, which he had brought with him, chargeth Joyeuse fiercely, and defeats a regiment newly come from Tholouse, with a supplie of powder, bullets, pikes, and iron forks.

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorencie Gouverneur of Languedoc supplies the beleeged with some troupes led by Leeques and Chambault, who advertised of new forces, come to Joyeuse, attend some dayes for Missillac Gouverneur of Anuergne, to ioine with him. Joyeuse means to prevent them, & before they ioine with the Auvergnas, to set vpon them. Hee chargeth them at Bellegard, and finds the beginning successefull and pleasing, but the end foule and mournfull: for he left the field, and returned with great losse.

Norwithstanding hee means to amaze the beleeged, and by the Councell of Onoux and Momberault politike Captaines, he makes many fires in his Campe, as signe of victorie and ioy: but Themines, Leeques and Chambault did but laugh at this policie. Missillac arrives at Montauban with a hundred maisters, and a good number of hargue-bushers. Joyeuse having his troupes then dispersed, some before Villemur, others in field against the Kings servants, all the Commanders resolute to fight with him. Missillac leads the forward, Chambault the battaile, Leeques the reereward: and the 19. of October they resolutely set vpon the Dukes first trench, by the regiment of Clouzel and Montoisson, garded by two hundred souldiars, and presently succoured by foure hundred others, they force them, and chase them to their second trench, after an houre and a halfe fight vnder their Commanders. The rest of the Kings armie comes violently vpon them. Themines issueth out of Villemur and chargeth them behind. He leaves the place, and retires farther off to Condommes, where his campe and artillerie remained. His men seeing themselves pursued, take this retreat for a flight: they grow amazed, all disband, all flie in disorder, feare makes them to loose their iudgement, and the most part casting themselves into the river of Tar, (the bridge of boats which Joyeuse had made being vncapable of so great a presse) desired rather to trie the fortune of the water, then of the victors sword. They cut the bridge, which was in a manner the death of all them that had trusted in this violent Element. Joyeuse disappointed of the vse of the bridge, leaps amongst the rest into Tar, being full of them that fled, and the Tar swalowing vp his bodie, as the rest, leaues his foule to seeke the place of his destiny. The victors passe the foard, and charge them that did swim in the water, pursue them that flie, cut all in peeces they encounter, and of so greata number bring but fortie three prisoners.

The death of about three thousand men ruined the League in Languedoc and Quercy. Three Cannons, two Culverins, two and twentie enseignes, and all the baggage, were the spoyle of this so memorable a day. And to make it the more memorable, the victors lost but tenne men, whereof foure, being not well knowne, did by mistaking run like fortune with the vanquished. Thus Villemur having endured about two thousand Cannon shot, was fully deliuered, with the losse of seuteene souldiars onely. The Dukes bodie was drawne out of the water, and buried in Villemur: and the Kings army, consisting

A consisting of five hundred maisters, and two thousand and five hundred shot, besides those which remained in the place beleeged, retired, (having purchased great honour) to their garrisons. Thus the Leagues affaires began to languish: the impatience and lightnesse of people (who promise vnto themselves much, and suffer little) did quench this great heat which was lately seene in good Townes, & the whole partie runs headlong to their ruine. They did no more take for payment the assurance which was given them, to provide shortly for this common disorder: and by an assembly of the Estates, proceeded to the Election of a King, who should raise the pillars of the Estate, and restore the good order and harmonie that should bee betwixt them. The zeale of the new Pope, Clement the eight, moved them very little. The forces and pistoles of Spaine grow hatefull vnto them. The actions of the Duke of Mayenne are detested, they abhorre the tyrannies which other petty Kings would practise in their Prouinces, and did well foresee, that the ambition of great men would soone thrust the people into the gulfe of utter ruine: finally quay one begins to lift vp his head, and to desire peace. They speake of it in the open Parliament of the League. The cheefe of the Cittie ioine with them that are most desirous of quiet, and in the end procure an assemblee of the Cittie of Paris, in the midst of November. They speake very plainly, to end these troubles, and to send to treat with the King to that end and purpose: besides (by the death of the Cardinall of Beaumont lately deceased,) the preferring and aduancing of the vnckle before the nephew, which they pretended, was no more of force.

The League declines.

The Duke of Mayenne seeing himselfe readie to be disappointed, goes to the Townehouse, intreats the assemblee to referre the decision of that point to the Estates, and to forbear to deale therein. Otherwise (said he) I shall haue reason to thinke that the authors thereof are ill affected to our partie, and will deale with them as with the enemies of our religion. Norwithstanding all his threats, it was decreed, that attending a conuocation of the Estates, they should send vnto the King to obtaine a free traffike betwixt them and the Townes of this Realme. The Duke not able to impugn this conclusion, seemed to allowe thereof.

This was to recover some life after a longuance and fainting, and to returne to the way of obedience: But the Legat of Rome (a pensioner of Spaine, and the cheefe of the League,) hoping to draw the affaires to another course, calling from all parts the Deputies of Townes confederate to assist at the Estates at Paris, they sought all means to mortifie these motives of charitie to their countie, which remiued in the most modest. And the better to aduance their desseins, they publish a certaine writing in forme of a Bull, commanding and giuing authoritie to the Cardinall of Plaisance to assist and to confirme the future election of a new King. This dorh sufficiently discouer that which hitherto they haue concealed and kept secret, couering (with the pretext of religion) their wicked and damnable conspiracie: which opened the gate to the overthrow and ruine of all order and humaine societie, instituted by God, especially of this most famous and flourishing monarchie, whereof the fundamentall law consists chiefly in the order of the lawfull succession of our Kings.

The Court of Parliament (being remoued from Paris to Chalons), by a decree of the eighteenth of Nouember, (confirming the request of the Kings Proctor general,) allowed of his appeale from the grant of the said Bull, and authoritie contained therein, the publication and execution thereof, and whatsoever was therein contained. They decreed, that Phillip of the title of Saint Onuphre, Cardinal of Plaisance, should bee cyted to plead against the sayd appeale. They exhorted all men not to suffer themselves to bee infected with the poyson and witchcraft of such rebells and seditious persons: but to continue in their duties like good and naturall Frenchmen, and to retaine still the obedience and loue they owe vnto their King and Countie, not adhering to the practises of such as (vnder the colour of religion) would inuade and trouble the State, and bring in the barbarous Spaniards, and other vsurpers. They 1592. They did expressly inhibit and forbid the keeping of the sayd Bull, to publish it, to A aide or fauour the sayd rebels, or to transport themselves into any townes or places that might bee assigned for the sayd pretended election: vpon paine for the Nobles to be degraded of their Nobility, and they and their posterity to be declared infamous and base, and for the Clergie to loose the possession of their benefices, and to be punished, as all other offenders, guilty of treason, troublers of the publike peace, traitors to their Country, without hope to obtaine pardon, remission or abolition. And all townes not to receiue the sayd rebels and seditious, to make the sayd assemblie, to lodge, entertayne or harbour them. Moreouer they decreed, that the place where that resolution had bene taken, together with the towne of the sayd assemblie, should be quite razed, without hope to be reedified: for a perpetuall memory of their treachery and treason. Commanding all persons to set vpon such as should transport themselves to the sayd towne, to assist at this assembly: And to the Proctor generall to informe against the Authors, and procurers of such monopoles and contrapacies made against the Estate.

This decree was but laughed at by the heads of the League, and did nothing daunt their priuate hopes. Euery one makes his faction apart. Euery one desired to set in his masters chaire: and not one would bee a seruant or Companion. The Dukes of Guise, Mayenne, Nemours, and Sauoy, the Marquis of Pont, sought by sundry practises to get the voices of the pretended Estates. The instructions found in the cofers of the Baron of Teniffey, after his defeat by Vaugrenan, who commanded for the King in Saint Iohn de Laune in Bourgogne, did sufficiently discouer the high projects which certaine bad Councillors made this yong Prince to conceiue. But about all, the Duke of Mayenne, supposing that after the death of the Duke of Parma, (whom he feared as very opposit to his authority,) this occurrent would giue him meanes to recouer his credit, began to play the King within Paris, hoping the Estates would prefer him before the yonger: or at the least, the title of Lieutenant generall to the King of spaine, could not escape him in the Conquest of the realme.

The Popes Bulls declared.

For the first fruits of his absolute power, he forceth the Presidents and Councillors remayning at Paris, to receiue Rosne, one of his most trusty friends, with the title of Marshall of the Crowne & gouernor of the Ile of France, dignities fit for a Nobleman D of a better house & quality. And to bridle the Parisians who demanded peace, he caused on Christmas Eue, going vp to the pallace (the City being in armes,) the foresayd decree against the Popes Bull to be openly burnt, then by a publike declaration he invited all the Catholikes of the realme to vnite themselves, & to forsake the obedience which they shewed to a Prince, whose profession & perseuerance made him incapable, & appointed the conuocation of the Estates on the 17. of January following at Paris. There ioyntly to seeke (without passion feared he or respect of any mans interest) the remedies which they should thinke in their conscience to be most profitable for the preservation of religion and the Estate.

But what Estates? Like vnto those of Troyes, where they disinherited Charles the 7. E the true and lawfull heire of the Crowne, as excommunicate. Estates chosen almost of all the scomme of the people, of the most malicious and seditious: corrupted by money, and all pretending some priuate profit in change and inuouation. A Parliament compounded of men, which eyther enioyed the benefice, the office, or the houle of their neighbour, or that had stolne his goods or detayned his reuenues, or (to conclude) that feared by a peace to be toucht for some committed Crimes, bankroucs, infamous, and wicked. Estates where there appeeres not one Prince of the bloud, no Chancellor, no Marshalls of France, no Presidents of Soueraine Courts, none of the Kings Proctors generall in his Parliaments: fewe men of reputation, knowne to haue loued the peoples good and their owne honours. No men of marke and account: F without whom they could not assemble, nor hold any iust and lawfull Estates. Finally a Parliament, where they see none but passionate strangers, gaping after France, geecdie of the bloud and welth thereof, ambitious and reuenging women: corrupt

A Preests, licentious and full of vaine hopes. No Noblemen of worth, but three or four, who already had resolved to abandon that faction: all the rest were beggarly, louing warre and trouble, during the which they ate the good mans bread, not able to maintayne their owne traynes in time of peace. An Italian Legat, and vassall to a strange Prince, (who in this quality neyther can nor ought to haue any place) sent to hinder the liberty of voices, and to authorise such as had promised him to do wonders for the affaires of Rome and Spaine. A Cardinall of Pelue a Frenchman by nation, but pleading the cause of the King of spaine and the rights of Lorraine. The Duke of Feris, and Mendosa Ambassador of spaine had their Agents and aduocates, by whom they gaue them to vnderstand, that the King of Spaines intention was only, to haue a King chosen that might pacifie the troubles of the realme, deliuer them from their enemies, defend them against all assaylants, and restore the Crowne to her first beauty. And representing the voluntary bounty of the Catholike King, and the great effects of the succors giuen by him vnto France; wherein hee had imployed about sixe millions of gold, he would inferre, that now but he was capable of this election: or else in regard of him, the Infant Donna Isabella, to whome the sayd Ambassador durst mayntaine, that by the Lawes of nature, of God and of the realme, it did belong. Doubtlesse from the insolent proceedings and proud desseins of strangers, the soueraigne author and gardien of Estates caused the preservation of this monarchie to growe.

The desseins of Spaine.

C They commended this Ambassage, and receiued it with honour. But the pretensions of this Infanta were reiected at the first, as a proposition contrary to the fundamentall lawes of the realme. His Agents seeing themselves frustrate of this first demand, they frame a second, vpon the election of the Arch-duke Ernest, first brother to the Emperour, to whome the King of Spaine promised to giue his daughter to wife, when as the assemblie had declared her Queene of France. But what should become of so many Competitors growne vp in France? So this proposition finding no man willing to entertaine it, remayned frutelesse.

Cross by some men of honour.

Nowe some thinking to giue the last mate to the Kings good fortune, vnto a third expedient: That if they giue this Crowne vnto the Noble Infanta, and to him of the D Princes of France, comprehending the house of Lorraine, whome the King of Spaine should choose, they would cause this election to bee seconded with an army of eight thousand foote and two thousand horse, and within fewe monethes to be fortified with the like numbers, which soone should reduce France wholly and peaceably to these newe Kings: that they would giue a hundred thousand Crownes monethly, so long as the warre should last, to entertayne ten thousand foote, & three thousand horse within the realme. Was not this to feed mens mindes with fancies, dreames and imaginations? But no man giues his voice to this last proposition. Doubtlesse there was no proportion, to recompence the succors sent by Philip to the reuolted townes, with the Crowne of France.

E Contrariwise many hauing their mindes merely French, knew wel that this proposition was to make matters irreconciliable, and to bring an immortal warre into France, and therefore with a feruent zeale, and great affection they opposed themselves against the reception thereof: hoping the eternall providence, who had so often rayed France from most greuous falls of warre, and from greater infirmities, would now preuent these latter dangers, otherwise then by the subuersion of the lawes which were made to support it. The declaration which his Maiesty opposed to that of the Duke of Mayenne, did much preuaile to fortifie those good mindes in their commendable resolution, and prepared their hearts generally to conceiue a great hope of a speedy peace. For the King discouering the practises of his rebellious subjects, namely of their heads, & the Dukes treachery, presuming to assemble the Estates of the realme, which may not be called but by royall authority, and for matter of religion, hee protesteth that besides the Couocation of a Councell, if there may be found any better or more speedie meanes to come to the instruction which they pretend

1553. pretend to giue him, to diuert him from the exercise of his religion, to that of the Catholike and Romish, he will willingly embrace it with all his heart, giuing leaue to the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and other Noblemen that did assist him, to lend their Deputies to the Pope to deale in this instruction, and to be pleased therewith, and blaming the Leaguers who had hindred the effects, hee layed a good foundation of the obedience which his subjects prepared for him. Declaring moreover this pretended assemblie at Paris, to be attempted against the Lawes, against the good and quiet of the realme: and all that should be treated or concluded therein, abusive, and of no force. Terming the Duke and his adherents in that case, guiltie of high treason: shewing that he could maintaine his authoritie against all vsurpers. But offering pardon to all Townes, Comonalties and persons seduced by the cheefe of the League, and exhorting them to remember themselves, hee made his subjects begin to taste that great and admirable clemencie, whereby he hath won the hearts, and brought the affections of the French to a perfect and most voluntarie obedience.

The conference at Surene.

To this declaration of his Maiestie, the Princes, and Noblemen Catholikes that were about him, added an other, which they sent to these pretended Estates, and required that some should be deputed on either part, to resolve of the fittest expedients to pacifie these troubles for the preseruacion of the Catholike religion and the Estate. The Duke of Mayenne and his partie accept of this conference, so as it may be done by Catholikes only, and it began the 29. of April at Surene neere Paris. Whilest the good Cardinall of Bourbon liued, he was an instrument for the League: now he is dead, religion is their onely pretext. And the more the King giues them hope of his conuersion to the Romish Church, the more violent they are to draw the people from this beleefe.

Cross by the court of Rome.

The Legat seekes to crosse it, and by a publike exhortation full of iniuries against his Maiestie, hee labours to perswade the French, that the King long since dismembred from the bodie of the Church, was most iustly pronounced incapable of the Crowne. Then opposing himselfe against the decrees of the Parliaments of Tours, and Orleans, made against the monitories of Landriano, he extols his masters praises, condemnes the Parliament which had condemned his Bulls, magnifies the Estates of the League, who reiected an obstinate heretike and relaps, with a resolution neuer to yeeld vnto him, for (said hee) such is the Popes will and pleasure. But why a relaps and obstinate, considering the due submission which our Henry makes to yeeld to better instruction? The Pope himselfe will harken soone vnto him, and all the Consistory will blesse his resolution.

The answer of the Estates to the Legat of Spain.

Both the Duke and Legat preuaile little in their deniues. Those which held the first place in this assembly, & had no other care but to preserue this Monarchie, found this expedient: That to frustrate the former propositions, they should say to the Duke of Feris and other ministers of Spain, that it would bee now out of season, and dangerous to make this election: and that the assemblie referred the conclusion thereof, vntill they might see an armie readie, by meanes whereof their resolutions might be supported and put in execution. Courage: this calme promisseth that wee shall soone anchor in a safe harbour. And that which aduanceth the ship of our Estate with a more prosperous gale, that great Senat of France remayning at Paris, resumes their credit, and the beautie of their scarlet robes: they exhort the Duke of Mayenne to imploy his authoritie of Lieutenant, that vnder colour of religion, the Crowne fall not into strangers hands, against the lawes of the Realme, and to prouide speedily for the peoples quiet: and by a decree of the eight and twentieth of Iuly, they declare all treaties made, or to bee made to that end, voyde, and of no validitie, as being made to the hurt and preiudice of the Salique Law, and other fundamental Lawes of State.

A decree of the Parliament at Paris.

This decree did wonderfully moue the Duke of Mayenne and the agents of Spain, especially against the President le Maistre who deliuered the speech: who encouraging all their chollers, left them to bite vpon the bridle.

But

1593. But see now the fatall blowe, which ruines that third party, by the which many Catholikes were readie to thrust the realme into newe combustions, and cuts off all difficulties, as well in them which made a scruple to fight vnder the Enseignes of a King of any other religion then their owne, as in others which had so long time shadowed their mutinies and rebellions with this goodly pretext. The King, after the taking of Dreux, satisfied in his conscience, by the instruction of the Arch-bishop of Bourges, of René Benoist Curate of Saint Eustache of Paris, and of some other doctors, desires to be admitted into the bosome of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Church, and the 25. of Iuly made a publike and sollemne profession at S. Denis to the sayd Arch-bishop, assisted by Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, Arch-bishop of Rouan, and Nephew to the deceased, nine Bishops with many other prelates and religious men: hee protested to liue and die in the sayd Catholike religion, swearing to defend it against all men: hee made profession of his faith, and performed all ceremonies requisite in so sollemne an act: and then he received absolution and blessing, with an admirable ioye and acclamation of the people.

The Kings Conuersion.

Presently after this sollemne act, his Maiesty sent the Duke of Neuers, the Marquis of Pisani, and Henry of Gondy, Bishop of Paris to the Pope, to yeeld obedience by them to the holy see, and to testifie that hee desired no lesse to imitate the example of Kings his Predecessors, and to deserue the title and ranke of the first sonne of the Church by his actions, then they had beene carefull to get it and preserue it, and to beseech him to allowe of his conuersion, and to countenance it with his owne blessing.

This is that great action of state which the chiefe of the League most feared: for what could they nowe obiect against the King, to contradict his right, and to terme him incapable of his inheritance? See nowe by what subtlety they seeke to crosse his Maiesties affaires, and to support the strangers. They complayne first of his sodaine change, & say they may not trust him. That his Holines must begin & send this worke. That the King should make all submissions to the see of Rome, and attend if the Consistory would declare him capable to gouerne the realme of France. That hauing commandement from the Conclauie they would aduise to do what should bee reason. Vntill the which were effected they could not treat any more with the Kings deputies, and till that this change of religion which the King had made, were approued by the Pope, whereof afterwards they would take aduise, for assurance of the preseruation of the onely Catholike religion in this realme.

The Duke of Mayenne hauing (to his great preiudice) so often tryed the proude insolencies of the Spaniards, and since knowne that their practises tended onely to feede a perpetuall fire of diuision among the French, by meanes of the election of a newe King, whome they promised to marrie to the Infanta, had often protested, that when hee should see the King returne into the bosome of the Church, from the which his religion had excluded him, he would presently yeeld him obedience as his most humble seruant. The Kings conuersion doth nowe free him of this imaginative scruple. The King himselfe offering him offices, and honorable aduancements, seekes to drawe him out off those snares from the which hee would willingly bee freed. But he is so farre engaged as hee can hardly retire himselfe: and some hope that the decisions of Rome, the resolution of the Estates, the conclusions of the Colledge of Sorboane, and the practises of Spain, would yet worke some good effects in his fauour, do withhold him from accepting of his Maiesties offers.

But on the other side he cannot digest the aduancement of the Duke of Guise, whose marriage with the Infanta the Partisans of Spain did solicit, as being heire to his Fathers pretensions. And to ouerthrowe it, hee seemes in generall termes to approue so great an honour done vnto his Nephew: but requiring for his owne particular so high and difficult things, hee piques them easily to vnderstand, that he will not submit his will, to the appetites of Pope Clement, nor of Philip King of Spain, neyther yet to the decision

1593 decision of Estates in that: whilst that he crosseth the propounded election of the Duke of Guise. The Conference at Surene giues the subiect meanes to tast the liberty of the fields and the sweetnesse of peace, concluding the last of Iuly a generall suspension of armes on eyther side for three monethes: a meanes which shall soone reduce whole provinces withdrawne from their ancient obedience. In the meane time, the more the Agents of Spaine see their practises disapointed, the more vehement they are that the Court of Rome should giue no audience to the Kings submission.

truce.

They oppose themselves by the meanes of the Ambassador of Spaine, at Rome, against the negotiation of the Kings Ambassadors with the Pope. They speake of his maiesties conuersion, as of a counterfeit thing, to deceiue the Church, and after his confirmation to ruine the Catholike religion. To conclude, they do their best to quench these coales of charity, which were kindled in the peoples hearts, and cause the Pope to reiect this faithfull and willing obedience, whereby the King will shewe himselfe a successor of the piety of Clouis, Charlemagne, and Saint Lewis, as well as heire of their scepter.

Execution of
ere.

But see one of the most violent attempts of the league, which had almost dissolved this harmony, which was prepared by a generall reconciliation of the French among themselves, and of them to their lawfull and soueraigne Lord. The 26. of August Peter Barriere borne at Orleans, was taken prysoner at Melun, where his maiesty was then, by the discouery of a Iacobin a Florentine, to whome he had confessed himselfe in Lions: (the Priest reuealing this crime incurres no Ecclesiasticall Censure) He confessed, that seduced and perswaded by a Capuchin of Lions, and afterwards confessed by Aubry Curate of Saint Andrew des Arts at Paris, by his vicar, and by father Varade a Iesuite, hee was come thither expressly to murder the King. And in truth the wretch was found seized of a sharpe knife with two edges: and for this cause hee was pinched with hot pincers, his right-hand burnt off, holding the sayd knife: his armes, legges, and thighes broken, and his bodie burnt to ashes and cast into the riuer.

Lions against
Nemours.

Whilst the Agents of Spaine labour for this election, and their partisans doting do as the frogges, who weary of their quiet King, made choise of the Storke, who in the ende denoured them all: the Duke of Nemours made his faction apart, and seeing that by the nomination of these goodly Estates hee should be excluded from his pretensions: knowing moreouer that his brother on the Mothers side, did crosse all his desseines, and bare him no good affection, hee resolved to canton himselfe in his gouernment, and by many and sundrie fortes both on the water and on the land, to plant his fortunes there. Already the Citadells and fortes he held a Toissay, Vienn, Montbrison, Chastillon in Dombes, Belleuille, Tiff, Charlieu and else where, threatened all Lionois with seruitude, if the Lord of Saint Iulian would haue sold him Quirieu for readie money: whome in the ende, (thrust on by the perswasions and presence of their Arch-bishop, sent by the Duke of Mayenne with this Comission among others) they force in his house, and the 18. of September put him with a gard into a straight priion in the Castell of Pierresence, from whence in the ende disguised, (playing the part of a grome of the Chambre, which carryed forth the excrements of his master,) he passed through the gardes turning away his face more for feare of beeing knowne, then for the ill smell: and escaping from them the three and twentieth of March following, being dispossessed of all his meanes, and expelled from his places, hee went and died in Ancy, a house of his owne, in the County of Geneue in Sauoye, not without suspicion of beeing poysoned at a feast that was made him.

Assembly at Mante.

This generall surceasing of armes prolonged vnto the ende of the yeare, and religion only obserued on eyther side, brought a great quiet to France, & gaue the king leysure to assemble some of the chiefe of the realme at Mante, to consult vpon sundy affaires, and particularly to heare the complaints of such as stood in doubt of the Kings change

A change in religion, and were greeued at diuers contrauentions of his Maiesties Edicts, whereby they suffered many wrongs in all Prouinces: for the partisans of Spaine, for their last refuge; continually exclaymed of the incompatibility of two religions in France, and many inclined to this opinion: That the King ought not bee admitted, but he should promise expressly to banishal such as made profession of any other religion then that which hee did embrace: or at the least to abolish all publike profession. But the King employed all his care to vnite his people in concord: and this new change did nothing alter the affection which hee did beare indifferently to all, as a common father of his subiects.

Thus armes were layd aside; whilst the Lord of Les-Deguieres hauing beaten the Sauoyard in diuers encounters, in Prouence, in Dauphiné, vpon the frontiers, and in Sauoye vpon his owne land, conquered many places in Piedmont, and lately succored Cuours which the Duke had beleeged two monethes, gaue great hope to force this neighbour enemy soone to yeeld what hee had lately vnrped of this Crowne, if hee had beene supplied with men, munition and money, and if some priuate seeds of new combustions had not drawne him away, to quench those fires which threatened to consume Prouence.

By what meanes and degrees, the townes subiect vnto the League, returned to the obedience of this Crowne: and the Spaniard chased out of the Realme.

V T courage oh my Countrymen. After a long and sharpe winter, wee begin to feele a pleasant spring. As the sunne rising on his horizon increaseth in heate and brightnesse: so the people are readie to imbrace the French liberty: their natural affection to their lawfull Prince reuiues: nowe wee shall see them which made the wound giue the remedie: the French striue now to submit themselves vnto their King; and the King to receiue his subiects with an admirable clemencie and fatherly affection.

The Lord of Vitry giues the first checke to the Spaniards. The sundrie conferences he had had with his Maiesty before Paris and else where, do now worke a great effect: for deliuering the towne of Meaux to the King as a New-yeares-gift, he gaue a plausible beginning to this yeare, and made the way for the Lord of la Chastre, his Vncle, to bring vnto his Maiesty two goodly Duchies at once, of Orleans and of Berry.

Meaux begins.
Orleans and Bourges se-condit.

Some townes practised by the heads of the League demand a continuance of the truce, but it was onely to prolong the miseries of France. The King therefore doth publish a declaration, shewing the wicked and damnable practises of the Leaguers, who vnder the continuance of a truce, would confirme their tyranny. He prescribes to all in generall one moneth of respite to acknowledge their lawfull King, and to performe all necessary submissions, to be restored to their charges, benefices, goods and liberties. Hee condemnes the rebels, and reuokes his pardon the time beeing expired.

The brute of this declaration, and the Kings preparatiues to punish the obstinate, terrified the heads and the most part of the townes and Comonalties, yet he was content to hold the staffe, but not to strike: and the prouidence of God conducted the worke of this restauration, by other then violent meanes. The Duke of Mayenne sought all meanes to auoide this blowe, but he had no forces able to preuent it.

So this vnion, cemented together with so many shiftes, oathes and coniurations, is diffembred on all sides: the most obstinate apprehend their totall ruine, if they persist in their rebellion.

The

The Kings Coronation.

THere was one thing very necessarie to seale the generall approbation of the Kings lawfull authoritie. Hee was not yet anointed, nor Crowned, and the want hereof, (as if his Coronation were the essentiall forme of a royaltie) serued yet as a maske to many to withhold their obedience. It is good in some things to please the peoples humor: and doubtlesse the end will shew, that this solemne action did serue as a bright Lanterne, to guide them to the port of obedience, which had resolued to yeeld. And, for that the rebellion of Reims had shut the gates against him, Chartres was the Rendezuons of this solemne ceremonie, and the Abbey of Marmoussier furnished the Oyle, which they keepe religiously in the holy vyall, with the like vse and vertue, as in former times Raoul was annointed at Soissons, Lewis the fourth at Lion, Hugues at Compiene, and Lewis the young likewise at Chartres. Thus was our Henry annointed in Chartres by the Bishop of the same place, the 27. of Februarie, in the presence of such Princes of the bloud, and officers of the crowne, as the time would suffer to honour the ceremonies. Let vs now see the fruites of this solemnitie. The Townes and commonalties of the League begin to tremble, and the most part determine to send their deputies to his Maiestie, being resolued to receive his commandements.

The fruites of his Coronation.

Lions reduced.

Misfortune is good for some thing. The Marquis of S. Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours, being yet a prisoner, assisted the inhabitants of Lions with all acts of hostilitie. The King of Spaine, on the other side confirmed his intelligences more strictly with them of his faction: and gaue them assurance by the Duke of Terra-nova, gouernour of Milan, of a leue of twelue hundred Suisses, the which with other forces hee would thrust into the towne, vnder pretext to succour it against the violences of the Marquis, but hauing drawne them in among the Inhabitants, he should through the fauour of the partisans of Spaine, make himselfe master of the towne.

Lions was now ready to fall vnder the rule and tyrannie of a stranger: but God stirrs vp meanes beyond mans reason. Some good men alwaies well affected to France in their hearts, with the consent of foure sheriffes, resolued to seeke the meanes to drawe the towne to his maiesties obedience.

They acquaint Colonel Alphonso with their enterprise, who giues them assurance of his fauour and succor in so good an occasion. The 7. of Ianuary he comes to the suburbs of Guillotiere with goodly troupes. And the same day betwixt three and foure of clocke in the morning Jaquet one of the Sheriffes, assisted by the Seignieurs of Liergues and de Seue (followed by a good number of armed men,) force a gard placed at the foote of the bridge vpon Saone, and constraime them to leaue the place. The towne is in armes, they make barricadoes in their streetes. Such as were of this enterprise, repaire to the quarters that were assigned them: euery man desireth the liberty of France. They seize vpon the Arcenall, and on the most factious officers and Captaines of the towne. All the people weare white-scarfes and fethers. That happie crie of, God saue the King, sounds in the ayre. They make bonfires in all places, they burne the armies and liuery of Spaine, Sauoy and Nemours, and the picture of the League in forme of a witch, and set vp the Kings in all places.

Here vpon Alphonso entred the towne, accompanied with d'Andelat, Cheuieries, S. Toricul, Botheon, la Liegue, Baume, de Mures, with many other gentlemen of the Countie: and for the finishing of so good a worke, he deposed the suspected Captaines of the towne, receiued the oath of fealty to the king of such as he did substitute in their places: and

And afterwards the Councell of the Towne did resolue and sweare neuer to admit any Italians or Sauoyens to publike charges: nations which had most nourished the fire of vnciuill rebellion within their Cittie.

The like broyle in a manner recovered the obedience of the Towne, and Parlement of Aix in Prouence to his Maiestie. The Duke of Espernon built a Cittadel there, to keepe them in awe, with whose humors they could not well agree. Moreouer he was not in good tearmes with the King, and seemed to pretend some inuouation to the preiudice of the Kings affaires. They therefore call vnto them Les Dignieres, and the King commaunds him to go with speed, and to oppose his forces against the Dukes in Prouence. Hee wanted men, money, and necessarie prouisions, to entertaine that which hee had exploited in Piedmont. He therefore furniseth the places he held, as the time would suffer him, and goes to crosse Espernon, razed the fort hee built against the Towne of Aix, and reduced the Inhabitants to their ancient obedience.

The miraculous reduction of Paris to his Maiesties obedience.

Amidst so many happie Catastrophes for the restoring of this monarchie, some notable inhabitants of Paris, which loued the Flower de Lys in their soules, made the way to free it from the rule of strangers: but many difficulties crossed the meanes they gaue vnto the King, who imployed all his desseignes to recover the ancient throne of his Predecessors. Paris was neuer without some Prince of the house of Lorraine, and aboue foure thousand French, Spaniards, Italians, Lansquenets, and Wallons, kept the Cittie in subiection. Seing then that of many enterprises not any one could succeed happily, neither might they attempt it by open force, without a horrible effusion of bloud, and bringing the Cittie in danger of extreame disolation, a surpris was therefore necessarie.

Miserable state of Paris.

It was now almost readie to bee effected, by the meanes especially of the Lord of Belin Gouernour of Paris, of Martin Langlois, Seigneur of Beaurepaire one of the Sheriffs of Paris for that year, and some others, of whome they had assurance for the execution of their proiect, as well of the Cittie, as of the souldiars practised long before. But the Duke of Mayenne being aduertised that the said Belin had intelligence with the king, puts him from his gouernment, and doth substitute in his place, the Earle of Brissac: and to fortifie the garrison with strangers, hee causeth foureteene hundred naturall Spaniards to approche.

By this displacing of the Lord of Belin, all their first desseins are made frustrate: but the Earles humor was found apt to vnite them. Hee sought the meanes to bring to light the effects, which hee had resolued, to purge the ill opinion of times past. As Langlois attended some fauourable opportunitie to discover himselfe to the said Earle, his Maiestie sends him word that he is agreed with him, that he should not feare to open himselfe vnto him, touching the meanes he had plotted with Belin. He confers with the Earle, lets him vnderstand such as bee of the intelligence, and they resolue together, That to bring the King in without effusion of bloud, (as hee desired,) the eue before the execution, they should carrie some stiffe to the new gate, that vnder colour to wall it vp, they should draw away the gabions that stopt the gates: that in the night they should cut away the earth which stopt that of Saint Denis, and so seize on the one and the other. That the Shrieffe Nerat with his children should take Saint Honorier gate, whereof hee had the keies, and draw in a good number of men of warre, to fauour the enterprise, and that by Saint Denis gate should enter an other troupe, of sufficient armed men, as well to seize on the gate, as of the rampar on either 1594. side, to make a barre betwixt the Spaniards and the Wailons, and keepe them from A ioyning. They keepe two gards nere Saint Denis gate, one at Saint Eustace Grosse and the other at the Temple. At the same instant the garrisons of Melun and Corbey should enter by boat at the Bulwarke by the Celestins, and should be receiued by John Grossier, and by the Seigneur of Cheualerie, the first being Captaine of the sayd Bulwarke, and the other Lieutenant Generall of the artillerie remayning in the Arce-nall. And to auoyd a popular tumult, a brute should be spread abroad of a peace betwixt the King, and the Duke of Mayenne, whom vnder colour of the peoples ieaousie of the Spaniards, which he had caused to approach vnto Beauuois, they had found meanes to send him out off Paris, with promise to cause them to retire. That ouer night they should giue tickets to the cheefe whome they knewe desirous of a peace, (as for B the multitude of factious, and the partisans of Spaine, they durst not speake openly vnto them to bring in the King, & some that were desirous of peace, could not rest assured of his clemencie and bountie) by the which they should bee aduertised of the accord, and intreated to arme with their friends for the bringing in of the Deputies of either part, which should come in the morning to make the publication, and resist the Spaniards that would oppose themselves. So it was decreed, and so executed.

This order being resolved on, it was imparted to those with whom the enterprise had beene long before concluded, by the meanes of the Lord of Vicques then Gouverneur of Saint Denis, to whome the greatest honour is due, both for that all the associates did rely vpon him, and daily were aduertised and encouraged by him, and also for that hee did carrie himselfe so wisely in Saint Denis, as he was more Gouverneur of Paris, then C of S. Denis. The nineteenth of March, the Secretaries of the Lords of Brissac and S. Luc carrie it to Senlis to the king, with a portrait of the Cittie, setting downe the places of the Strangers gards, & of their partisans. They are searched going out of the Towne, but they remember not to looke into their gloues, where their instructions were written by the hand of the sayd Langlois the Sherife.

The King giues them aduice for the execution, the night before the 22. day of the moneth, about foure of the clocke he finds all things readie, and the new gate, and S. Denis gate at his deuotion. He enters with his troupes, led by the Lords of Hamieres, Felin, Vicques, & Fuans, at the same gate by the which the deceased king parted mourn- D fully out of Paris. At the same instant the Lord of Vitri comes with a troupe of men at armes to Saint Denis gate, bears backe the strangers who made resistance vpon the rampar, enters the Towne, sets gards at the gate, and on the rampars, then passing through Saint Denis street, he encounters his Maiestie, whose troupes were come to Saint Michels bridge, and before the Pallace.

Thus according to the oth which his Maiestie had taken of the Captaines of euery companie, Not to do or suffer any insolencie or outrage to any Cittizen, but to such as should obstinately make resistance, all his troupes enter without disorder, without murder, without spoyle, and by their perfect obedience testifie how great his authoritie is that commands ouer them. The King being seized of the Louure, the pallace, E both Chastellets, and other cheefe places of the Cittie, and assured of the Duke of Feria and his Strangers, hee went armed with his caske on his head, with an incredible concourse and ioy of the people, to our Ladies Church, and there gaue sollemne thanks to the Soueraigne Protector of this monarchie: who hauing as it were, led him by the hand, by such extraordinarie and miraculous meanes, into the Capitall Cittie of the realme, gaue him hope that he should soone chase the stranger out of his inheritance, and peaceably inioy the throne of his predecessors.

In the meane time the Earle of Brissac, John L'huillier master of the accounts, and Frouost of the Marchants, with the Shrieve Langlois, accompanied with the Heraults, went through the Cittie, proclaiming the Kings generall pardon: causing them to take white scarfes, and gaue tickets printed at Saint Denis, containing an abolition of all offences past. So as in lesse then two houres, all the Cittie was quiet, euery man went to his ordinarie exercise, the shops were opened, as if there had beene no altera- tion,

A bold and aduenterous execution.

A tion, and the Townesmen grewe familiar with the men of warre. There was nothing 1594 but signes of wonderfull ioy and loue: the bitterness of the proud and insolent command of the Spaniard, made the Parisians to tast the sweetnes of the fatherly rule of their Kings, and those detest him as an enemy, who lately feared and respected him as a master.

A happie and famous day, wherein the people (lately so contrary and full of cru- eltie,) reduced to that miserie, as they durst not sigh in their miserie, exceeding glad to see a meanes to inioy their ancient libertie, know not with what acclamations to receiue their peacefull and gracious King, who by his wonderfull clemencie, washing away the blemishes wherewith Paris had beene vnworthily polluted, made the Inhab- itants, of slaues Cittizens, restores them, their wiues, children, goods, honours, Magi- strates, and liberties, and giues peace to them who lately held it a crime to demand bread onely, and capitall to demand bread and peace together. His Maiestie suffred the Duke of Feria, Don Diego with other Commaunders and men of warre, to de- part with their baggage, their matches out, and their armes downe. The Bastille made some shew of resistance: but as al was prepared to force it, & that their victuals (which were purposely kept backe) began to faile them, De Bourg hauing the command thereof, yeelded it three dayes after: and his Maiestie to recompence such as had ser- ued him in this enterprise, gaue them great gifts with many offices and aduancements.

Hee confirmed all the companies of the Cittie, and disannulled the declarations C which had beene published in the moneth of March. 1589. he restored the Lord d'O to his gouernment, from the which the generall reuolt had expelled him: hee appointed him to go to the Towne house, to take an oth of the officers in the presence of Mon- sieur Francis Miron, one of the Kings priuie Councell, master of Requests, and President of the great Councell, ouerseer of the gouernment of the Kings armies, and appoin- ted to assist him. And the Earle of Chiuerny Chancellor of France, assisted with the Seigneurs of Ris, Pontcarre, Miron and other Councillors of the priuie Councell, and masters of Requests of the Kings house, to the number of twelue, went to the Pallace, and caused the letters of reestablishment of the Court of Parliament to be read, and at the instance of Loysel, appointed in the absence of the Kings officers, they tooke the oth D of all the Presidents, Councillors and officers of the said Court, before the returne of the Parliament removed to Tours, in the yeare 1589. And so in like sort to other com- panies, the chamber of accounts, Court of Aides & chamber of the money, to whom Councillors were sent to do the like as to the Parliament, and to continue their places and dignities, with the other officers resident at Tours, whome this happie reduction brought within few weekes after to their antient seat of iustice. Paris being freed from the command of strangers, and reduced vnder the obedience of their natural and law- full King, it was needfull to repaire that, which the libertie of warre had changed, touching the Lawes and grounds of the Estate, and the rights and honours of the Crowne. To this end, the Court of Parliament lately establishes, reuokes, and dis- annuls by a decree of the 30. of March, all other decrees, orders, or othes giuen or made E since he 29. of December. 1588. to the preiudice of the Kings authoritie, and the lawes of the realme, decreeing that as things forced by violence, they should remaine suppressed for euer. And especially they disannulled all that had beene done against the honour of the deceased Kings, as well during his life, as after his decease: forbidding all persons to speake of his memorie but with honour & respect: commanding to informe of the detestable parricide committed on his person, and to proceed extraordinarily against such as should bee found culpable. They reuoked the authoritie giuen to the Duke of Mayenne vnder the title of Lieutenant generall of the Estate and Crowne of France, forbidding all men to acknowledge him with that qualitie, to yeeld him any o- bedience, fauour, comfort, ayd, vpon paine of high treason. They likewise inioyned the Duke of Mayenne, vpon the like paines, & other Princes of the house of Lorraine, to ac- knowledge King Henry the 4. of that name, for King of France & Nauarre, for their king, to yeeld him the obedience of faithfull seruants and subiects. And to all other Princes,

A decree against the League and the Duke of Mayenne.

Prelates,

1594 Prelates, Noblemen, gentlemen, Townes, Commonalties & priuate men. To France that pretended faction of the League, wherof the Duke of Mayenne had made himselfe the head, and to yeeld vnto the King obedience, seruice, and fealtie, vpon paine to the said Princes, Prelates, Noblemen, and gentlemen, to bee degraded of their Nobilitie and gentry, and they and their posteritie declared base, with confiscation of bodies and goods: and the razing of their Townes, Castels, and places, that should infringe the Kings ordinances and commaundements. They reuoked and disannulled all that had beene done or decreed by the pretended Deputies of the assembly held at Paris, vnder the names of the generall Estates of the Realme, as voyd, done by priuat persons, chosen and suborned for the most part by the factious of this Realme and partisans to the Spaniard, having no lawfull power: forbidding the said pretended Deputies to take vpon them this qualitie, and to assemble any more in the sayd Cittie, or else where, vpon paine to be punished as troublers of the publike quiet, and guiltie of high Treason. They inioyned such of the pretended Deputies as were yet resident at Paris, to retyre home to their houses, to liue there vnder the Kings obedience, and to take the oth of fealtie before the Iudges of those places. Moreouer they decreed, that all processions and solemnities instituted during the troubles thereof, should cease, and in stead thereof, the two and twentieth day of March should bee for euer celebrated, and the same day a general procession should be made after the accustomed maner, where the said Court should assist in their scarlet roabes, as a remembrance, to gude God thanks for the happie reduction of this said Cittie to the Kings obedience.

The voluntary submission of the vniuersitie. As the vniuersitie by their treacherous decision had before countenanced and supported the Parisiens intolencies and mutinies, so now by their humble and due submission, of their owne proper motion, they seeke to repaire the crime they had committed. James of Amboise Doctor in Physicke, chief Rector, chosen since the reduction of Paris, the Deane and the Doctors of Sorbonne, the deanes and doctors of other faculties, all the members and Officers of the vniuersitie, come to the King to yeeld him a testimonie of their loue, and finding him in the chapell of Bourbon, prostrate before his Maiestie, they acknowledge him their true and onely naturall Prince, sweare to be obedient and faithfull seruants to him for euer, and beseech him (as to his other people which submit themselves like good and loyall subiects,) to extend his fauour vnto them. The Kings owne disposition did moue him, but the place did inuite him to this pardon. He protests before God, to be as readie to remit the offences of others, as he desired Gods diuine Maiestie to be merciful vnto his. So he receiued them, and sent them home graciously.

Paris gave example to all the rest of the Realme. And the first fruits of this happie reunion began to ripen in the hearts of other Townes and Comonalties. So the monethes of Aprill and May, were spent to receive the submissions of diuers Prouinces, and drawing to the Kings obedience, many Captaines, gentlemen, Noblemen, and other chiefe pillars of the League. So as euery birde hauing his feather, the Crow in the fable remaind in the end naked. The Lord of Villars submits himselfe to his foueraine Lord, and yeelding him the townes of Rouan, Newhauen, Harsen, Montmiller, Pontau de mer, and Vernueil: hee obtains in exchange the office of Admirall of France, and hereafter resolues a most obstinat warre against the Spaniard. But a sad accident shall tooone frustrat the desseins he made with his Maiestie. Abbeville hath bin alwaies called the Cittadell of Picardie, lying at the mouth of the sea. Maupin the Maior, and some inhabitants, had resolved to giue a great check vnto the League: but the feare of the Duke of Amboise factions restrained them, and the seditious impressions of Preachers, (who throughout the Realme, haue beene the greatest motives of these last mutinies) made this their good will fruitles. The King being aduertised hereof, did hazard Franc, one of the Secretaries of his Chamber, who was borne at Abbeville, to found and discover the end of their intentions.

Hee parts in Aprill, and vnder colour to visit his friends, he behaues himselfe so discreetly in his negotiation, that in lesse then eight dayes they resolved in open assembly to

A to send their deputies to yeeld themselves at his Maiesties feete, who in token of so good a seruice, ennobled France and his posteritie, and augmented the priuileges of the Towne.

In the same moneth, the inhabitants of Troyes expelled the Prince of Joynville, and recalled the Lord of Inteuille, their ancient gouernour for the King. The Townes and Prouinces contend, who shall haue the honour to returne first to their due obedience, from the which these popular furies had withdrawn them: Sens, Poitiers, Agen, Ville-neufue, Marmande, and other Townes of Gascogne, and in a manner all that had followed the dance of Orleans and Paris, do now frame themselves to their tune. And all this is done in few weekes. The most factious of the partie, did still feed the fire of rebellion in some Townes of Picardie: Amiens and Beauuois wauered: the Spaniard possessed Laon and La Fere, places of importance in that Prouince: and the Count Charles of Mansfield had euen now besieged and taken Capelle, a small Towne, but strong in the Duchie of Thierafche. The King being aduertised thereof, went home to their Trenches, to drawe them forth to fight: but making no show to come forth, to get that by force, which he could not obtaine by reason, hee besiegeth Laon, defeats the succors at sundry times that come to the besieged, kills aboute fiftene hundred of their men in sundry encounters, and taking the Towne by composition in the end of August, he ends (by this act) the furies of ciuill warres without hope of reuiuing, and then returns triumphing to Paris.

C Chasteau Thierry, before the siege, and after the siege of Laon, Amiens, Beauuois, and all the Townes in Picardie (except Soissons and La Fere, which the Duke of Mayenne and the Spaniard held) did shake off the Strangers yoke, and tooke the oth of fealtie to the King. Cambray did likewise acknowledge him, and gaue his Maiestie such aduantage, as his enemies remained without meanes to maintaine the warre, and without hope to obtaine their peace. The Duke of Mayenne in the meane time entertained all his friends and intelligences at Bruxelles: but the supplies of men and money which hee drew from thence, were not able to stay the course of the Kings prosperities. Hee therefore retyred himselfe into Bourgongne, to assure such places as were yet at his deuotion.

D Contrarywise, his neereft kinsmen retyring themselves, left him almost alone to treat with the Spaniard. The Duke of Nemours made his accord at the Castle of Pierre-aurise, but being escaped the 26. of Iuly, as we haue sayd, death deprived him of the vse of his libertie, as wee shall see hereafter. The Duke of Guise did first resist, that hee desired nothing more then the Kings seruice, and drawing in the moneth of Nouember to his Maiesties seruice his bretheren with himselfe, many Noblemen, the Cittie of Reims, and many other places, it did greatly shake this monstrous building, which was now ready to fall to ruine.

The sect of Iesuits had as chiefe pillars of the League, mightily supported it vnto this day, and by all meanes laboured to aduance the Spaniard in France: they had spread throughout the whole realme, the furious effects of the fire which they had kindled, and continued in priuate confessions (as lately in their Sermons) to disgrace the memorie of the deceased King, and the Maiestie of the King now reigning: and to encrease it, the principall of their Coledge, and some others, had lately approued, countenanced, and perswaded that execrable attempt of Peter Barriere. The Vniuersitie of Paris grounding the renewing of their ancient Processe against the Iesuites, vpon these considerations and motiues, demand the rooting out of them. Some great men, and of the chiefe men of Iustice, sue for them: the Cardinall of Bourbon supports them: The Duke of Neuers makes their cause his owne. The respect of their learning, and care and diligence to instruct and teach youth, did moue them: and a very vrgent cause must drawe the Court of Parliament (whose authoritie notwithstanding they did contemne and reiect) to pronounce and declare this great decree, the which an accursed and detestable attempt, by one of their owne disciples, did in the

They procured that the cause might bee pleaded secretly, for that (said their Aduocate) to defend my Clyents, I shall bee forced to speake some things offensive to many which haue lately turned to the Kings seruice. But their pleadings are to be read in Arnault against them, and Verforis for them, both graue and learned aduocates.

By the reduction of so many Prouinces, Townes, Comonalties, and priuate Noblemen, the League shall bee now confined into some corners of Bourgongne, Picardie, and Brittanie, where the Spaniards (to haue alwaies footing within the Realme) enter-tayned the hopes of the Duke of Mayenne and Mercaur. The first began to fall from them: but the other grounded vpon some vaine pretensions of the Duchie, where he governed by reason of his wife, hoped to preuaile, if not of all, yet at the least of a good part. The Queene Dowager his Sister, laboured to make his peace: but hee delayed the time, knowing that in his greatest extremity he should finde grace with the King.

The Spaniard being brought into Blancet by his meanes (a fort which the situation of the country had made almost impregnable, if as they had built a fort neere vnto Croisse, to shut vp the entrie of the port at Brest, they had also made an other right against it on the other banke) hoped that being chased out of the other Prouinces, he should yet hold this as a pawne for the money he had disbursed. His Maiestie sent the Marshall D'Aumont, and Generall Norric an English man, to encounter him, who fortified with a Fleete, vnder the command of Captaine Frobisher, they became maisters of Quimpercorentin and Morlay, and then they forced the new fort at Croisse, and slue (but with the losse of men, and of the sayd Frobisher,) foure hundred Souldiars, to whom the gard was committed.

France grew quiet, yet must they imploy the Souldiars, and carry the warre into the Spaniards country. It seemed this would free the realme, but sildome doth it bring forth the effects that are expected. Yet for a triall, the King agrees with the Estates of Holland and their confederates, to inuade the Duchie of Luxembourg with their common forces. The Duke of Bouillon, now Marshall of France, and the Cont Nassau, seeke to enter in October, but they finde the passages stop, and the Cont Charles Mansfield before them, who by the defeat of the Hollanders troupes, made this attempt fruitlesse. On the other side, the King seekes to keepe the frontiers of Picardie safe from the Spanish forces, and threatened Arthois and Hennault: That if they fauoured the forces of Spaine, which molested Cambray and the Countries there about, he would make violent warre against them. The Estates of those Prouinces make no answer to these threats, framing their excuse that they could draw no direct answer from the Archduke Ernest, Lieutenant generall for the King of Spaine in the Low Countries, who soone after perswaded the subjects of the sayd Countries to arme, and to inuade France.

The better to knowe Picardie, and to iudge of what should be necessary against the attemptes of this new enemy, the King makes a voyage to the frontier, and then returns to Paris, to celebrate the solemnity of the knights of the order of the holy Ghost, and to receiue the Ambassadors of Venise, Vincent, Gradenigo and John Delphino being sent to congratulate the happy successe of his affayres, and Peter Duodo to succeed John Mocenigo. At his arriual he receiues three good aduertisements: That the Marshall d'Aumont had taken from the Spaniard one of the places he had fortified in Brittanie: That the Spaniards thinking to enter into Montreuil, hauing giuen fiftie thousand Crownes to the gouernour, had bene repulsed with the losse of fife or sixe hundred men: And that the Marshall of Bouillon had ioyned with the army of Cont Maurice in despite of Cont Charles.

But oh monstrous attempt, the onely remembrance should make our haire to stare, and our hearts to tremble. The 27. of December, the King being booted in one of the Chambers of the Louure, hauing aboute him his Cousins the Prince of Cony, the Cont Soissons and the Earle of S Paul, and a great number of the chiefe Noble men of his Court, bending downe to receiue the Lords of Ragny, and Montigny, who kist his knee, a yongman called John Chastel, of the age of eightene or nineteene yeares, the

hurt in the face.

A sonne of a wollen draper in Paris, a Nouice of the Iesuits, encouraged by their instructions, & thrust on by a diuelish furie, creeps into the chamber with the presse, & surprising his Maiestie as he was stooping to take vp these gentlemen, in steed of thrusting him into the bellie with a knife, as he had determined, he strooke him on the vpper lippe, and brake a tooth. This wretch was taken, and confessed it without torture. The King vnderstanding that he was a discipule of that schoole. Must the Iesuits then (said hee) be iudged by my mouth?

Thus God (meaning by this cursed and detestable attempt) to countenance the pursute of the vniuersitie of Paris against that sect, John Chastel hauing declared the circumstances of his wicked intent, was found guiltie of treason, against God and man in the highest degree, and by false and damnable instructions (holding that it was lawfull to murder Kings, and that the King now raigning was not in the Church vntill he were allowed by the Pope) was by a decree of the Court condemned to do penance before the great dore of our Ladies Church, naked in his shirt vpon his knees, holding a burning torch of two pound weight, to haue his armes and legges pinched at the Greue with burning pincers, and his right hand holding the knife wherewith hee sought to commit this parricide to bee cut off, his bodie to bee torne in peeces by foure horses, burnt to ashes, and cast into the wind, and all his goods forfeit to the King. The said Court decreed by the same sentence, That the Prests, schollers, and all others terming themselves of that societie, (as corrupters of youth, troublers of publike quiet, and enemies to the Kings state,) should depart within three dayes after the publication of this decree, out of Paris, and other places whete they had colledges: and within fiftene, out of the Realme, vpon paine after the said time to bee punished as guiltie of high treason, all their mouable and immouable goods to bee forfeited, to bee employed in godly vses, forbidding all the Kings subiects to send any Schollers to the Colledge of the said societie without the Realme, there to be instructed or taught, vnder like paines as before.

The Decree was executed the nine and twentieth of the said moneth. Peter Chastel the father, and John Gueret schoolemaster to this murtherer, were banished, the first for a certaine time out off Paris, and fined at two thousand Crownes, the last for euer out off the realme, vpon paine of death. The fathers house standing before the pallace, razed, and a pillar erected conteyning (for a perpetuall monument) the causes of that ruine. Amongst the writings of one named John Guignard of Chartres, were found certaine outrageous and scandalous libells against his Maiestie, made since the generall pardon granted by him at the reduction of Paris, for the which hee was executed the seuenth of Ianuary following. Experience hath often taught, that armes produce greater effects abroad in the enemies Countie then at home, and that the goodliest triumphe is sought farthest off. Our vni-ciuill confusions were forged cheefly in Spaine: and the Iesuits had bene the cheefest workemen. One Francis Jacob a scholler of the Iesuits of Bourges, had lately vnto to kill the King, but that hee held him for dead, and that an other had done the deed. And this horrible attempt of late vpon the sacred face of his Maiestie, (wherin hee was miraculously preserued) doth wimes, that they were the cheefe firebrands. So the King grounding the necessitie of his armes vpon these considerations, after hee had rooted out this sect of Schooles, which they held within the Iurisdiction of the Parliament of Paris, hee published a declaration for the making of warre against the King of Spaine. Without doubt the reasons were verie apparent and manifest, and the beginning more fauourable then the end.

The Marshall of Bouillon begins this new warre: he enters the Duchie of Luxembourg with an armie of a thousand horse, and foure thousand foote, and at the first puts to rout eleuen Corners of horse of Cont Charles neere to Wyrton, kills two hundred and fiftie vpon the place, makes the rest to leaue armes, horse and baggage, and to save themselves in the next worst. Philip likewise for his part proclaims warre against our Henry. The Duke of Lorraine on the other side, having taken a truce with his Maiestie, the Baron of Auffonville, with the Seigneurs of Tremblecourt and Saint George (who before made warre vnder him) now take the white leafe, they enter the County of Bourgogne with a thousand horse, and five thousand foote, and at the first they seize vpon Vezou de l'ouille, and other places.

Behold the fire which threatens two Prouinces: but the Spaniards suffers them not to be consumed, as men presumed, that being busie to quench it, he would leave Picardie in quiet. Hee commands the Archduke Erneste, that with the hazard of the Lowe Countries he should transport all his forces into Picardie, and moreover causethe Constable of Castille gouernour of Milan, to passe the Alpes with a great armie of Spaniards and Neapolitanes, who recouered the places, and forced the Lorraines to disperse themselves.

Spaniards in Picardie.

The Duke of Nemours makes warre against Lions.

The Artesiens and Hannuyers, foreseeing the desolation which the continuance of this warre would cause, solicited the Archduke to seeke some meanes to quench it: but death cuts off the course of his enterprife. The Earle of Fuentes (that is to say Fontaines) aduanced them courageously, causing the gouernour of Arthois to enter into Picardie with a thousand horse, and sixe thousand foote. Bei old rough seas and great stormes, which violently beat vpon our great Pilot: but in despite of their attempts, he shall guide his ship to a safe port, and bring his enterprises to an end. Vienne, Nuiz, Autun, Beaune and Dijon, did happily assist him: let vs see the successe. The Duke of Nemours escaped from prison, assembled a good troupe of Souldiers, horse and foote, and drawing to him three thousand Suisses which wintered in Sauoy for the defence of the Country, with these forces hee pretended to subdue the Prouinces of Lionnois, Forest and Beauueulois, and to reuenge the disgrace hee had received in Lions.

For a beginning, he had reduced to his deuotion, This a strong Castle in Lionnois, Tienne in Daulphiné, Feur, Montbrison, Saint Germaine, and Saint Bonnet, Townes in Forest: and by this restraining them both aboue and beneath the river, hee made an account eyther to bring Lions to some extremity of victuals, or to cause some tumult among the people, who should giue him entrie into the Citie. Being ready to effect his desseignes, the Constable parted from Languedoc, to ioyne with the King, hee resolues in this encounter to doe him a notable seruice. Hee comes into Lionnois, followed with a thousand horse, and foure thousand choise Harguebuziers, happily for the preservation of the Countrey: for hee presently stayed the course of the Duke of Nemours prosperity, who posting to oppose himselfe against the Constable (having made a voyage to the Constable of Castille, with hope to haue authoritie ouer the forraigne forces, and to dispose of them for the execution of his desseignes) fortifies Saint Colombe, a small village at the foote of the bridge of Vienne towards Lionnois, lodgeth some troupes there, and the rest hee puts in garrison into the Towne.

This great multitude of men shutte vp in Vienne, makes their victuals grow scant: they likewise want other necessities and munition for warre. The Constable cures off all meanes from them. The Suisses mutine for want of paye, and being called home by their Colonels, go to ioyne with the forces of Sauoy, which the Marquis of Treafort commanded, being Lieutenant generall for the Duke of Sauoy, on this side the Alpes. To curbe Lions more straightly, the Marquis came to winter his men at Ascunthuel, a small Towne of Sauoy, three Leagues from Lions. The Constable preuents him, and surprising the Towne, disapoints the Marquis, lodgeth his men drye, and leaues the Sauoyssien subiect to the iniuries of the ayre, and keeps him from attempting anything against Lions.

The Constable aduertised of some discontent betwixt the Captaines of the Strangers that were in Vienne, and the Seigneur of Disimieu a Gentleman of Daulphiné, who commanded in the Castle of Pipet, the chiefe Forte of the sayde Towne, he

He practiseth Disimieu, lets him vnderstand of his dutie to the Kings seruice, his naturall Prince, his duty to his Country, and the profit hee shall bring by the reduction of this Towne, to so many people threatened with forraigne oppression.

Disimieu giues care, and without any great difficulty, hauing passed his word to the Constable, suffers the Seigneur of Montoisson to enter the Castle with a troupe of Harguebuziers. The Constable parts the 24. of Aprill, with eight hundred Harguebuziers, three hundred horse, and many Gentlemen, as well of the Country, as his owne followers: and marcheth towards Vienne. The Marshall of Ornano doth likewise meete him, with five hundred Harguebuziers, and two hundred maisters. All shew themselves about Vienne at noone-day. Then Disimieu giues the Seigneur of Cheylart, and Dom Vincentio Colonnell of the Italian foote (that were there in garrison) to vnderstand, That being well informed of the sinister practise and charge they had to seize vpon his person, hee had resolved to yeeld the Towne and Castle vnto the King: yet would he not put it in execution, before hee had obteyned a safe conduct for them and their troupes.

Montoisson shewes himselfe with his troupe, and makes Cheylart and Vincentio to accept the condition that was offered them. They go forth, and take the way to Sauoy, guarded by a company of light-horse. Disimieu brings them vnto Saint Blandine, where the Constable attended him, and there takes the oath of obedience and fealtie to the King. Towards night the Constable entred Vienne, and receiued the Towne and Castles of Pipet and La Bastie in his Maiesties name. So Vienne, the onely Sanctuarye of the Duke of Nemours, the Rendezuous of Strangers, and the Porte of Daulphiné to neighbour Prouinces, caused the quiet of all the Country, and neighbours about. Since the which the Duke alwayes droopt, being contemned, hated, and frustrated of all his attempts: and finally hee ended all his griefes by a mournfull and pitifull end.

As all things succeeded happily for the King, the Marshall of Biron hauing taken Beaune in view of this great armie of the Constable of Castille, Autun & Nuys in Bourgogne, hee puts himselfe into Dijon, being called by the Inhabitants, hee chased away the Vicount of Tauannes troupes, (who held the Inhabitants shutte vp in a corner of the Towne,) fortified their Barricadoes against the Castle, and did beleaguare it, attending his Armie, which made haste to returne out of the Franche Comté.

His Maiestie foreseeing, that the Constable of Castille being free, after the recouerie of Vezou, should bee employed by the Duke of Mayenne, to succour the Castle of Dijon, wherein consisted the chiefe hope of his rising, makes hast to Troyes, makes a solemne giuing of thanks for so happy a victory, and takes his way to Dijon, arrives there the fourth of Iune, carrying with him the execution of a desseigne, more miraculous then all the rest. Without doubt our posterity may put this History with the fabulous tales of the foure sonnes of Aymond, of Rowland, Oliuer, and others, if wee set not downe the trueth, with the chiefe circumstances: for is it not a dreame, an enchantment, and a fabulous tale, that foure score Cavaliers, but true French Gentlemen, generous, and well lead, haue amazed and put to flight, two thousand horse? But what durst not this braue Nobility doe, hauing in the head of them so incomparable and valiant a Captaine, and a King so well beloued and respected of all?

The Castillian had already passed his troupes and Artillerie, vpon bridges of boates at Grey: when as the King hauing fortified the Inhabitants with a thousand men, commanded by the Earle of Thorigny, hee viewed the Castle of Dijon, the Fort of Talen a Cannon shotte from the Towne: and all the approaches, whereby the enemy might attempt to succour the Castle, made choise of bataille fite to stay him, and where to make Fortes for the restraining of the sayde Castle: hee resolues to free him of halfe his paines, and to meete him in the middle way, with a double intent, the one to fight with him at the passage: the other, to giue the 1595. Assaultants time to finish their trenches against the Castell. For the execution hereof, he assigns the Rendezvous at Lux vpon Tille and Fontaine-Françoise to a thousand horse, and five hundred Carabins, whom hee would vnderstand in this rare stratagem: and the same day parts with the onely Companie of the Baron of Lux, and some thirtie horse, and comes to Lux, and from thence to Fontaine-Françoise, putting a troupe of foote into two Castells which are in the village of Saint Seine vpon the riuier of Vigenne, to stop the enemies passage. It was the directest and best way to come to the succor of Dijon.

A League from Fontaine-Françoise, the Marquis of Mirebeau giues his Maiestie intelligence, that hee hath encountered with two troupes of three or foure hundred horse, which made him retyre in haste: that hee did thinke to haue seene some wings of the armie behind, but hee had no leisure to discouer them plainly. He spake thus, for all the Castilians armie was aduanced to seize vpon the passage of Saint Seine.

Some weake spirit or lesse generous then our Henry, would presently haue resolved to make an honorable retreat: but this did kindle his courage, and increate his desire to see their Countenance. Hee sends the Marshall of Biron with the company of the Baron of Lux, to discouer if it were the armie, or some other troupe that went to the warre, and himselfe followed the marshall a good pace. A hundred paces beyond Fontaine-Françoise, the Marshall discouers about threescore horse vpon a hill, mid way to Saint Seine, situate at the foote thereof on the one side, so as the villages cannot see one another. The Marshall resolves to chase them, to see what the enemy did behind. Hee sees the enemies armie comming to the said village, and neere vnto a wood fast by, about three hundred horse, which had beat backe the Baron of Ausouille, whom his Maiestie had likewise sent before with a hundred horse, to see if the enemy marched or stayed.

These (supported by their whole armie, which followed them at the heeles) put forth one troupe on the right hand, and another on the left, who make a shew to charge the Marshall, that they might obserue what forces followed him. To frustrate their expectation, hee causeth the Marquis of Mirebeau to stretch forth at large on the one hand, and the Baron of Lux on the other, and then assured that the enemies armie followed, hee began to make his retreat towards the King. The enemy perceieth him, taking this retreat for a kind of flight: But hee retyred onely, to charge more furiously. The Baron of Lux sees a troupe, which aduanced before their armie, and enters so hotly amongst them, as his horse being slaine, hee remaynes engaged in great danger, if the Marshall had not fallen on them with so rough a charge as they were constraind and forced to turne their backs.

Hereupon issue forth from the woods, many troupes of horse, which in all with them that marched before, made about twelue hundred. The Marshall (discouering them) retyres more speedily, as well to aduertise his Maiestie that all their armie followed, as also to tell his Maiestie, that hee had meanes with his horse to fight with theirs before their foote could arriue. Before hee could deliuer this vnto the King, the troupes of the Baron of Thianges, Theniffey, Villiers, Houdan, and a companie of Carabins ioyned with him, whome he had chased, & force him to turne head, but with twentie horse onely, for the great number of enemies at the first view had amazed most of them which followed the Marshall. He chargeth, and ouerthrowes the first he encounters. But two wounds, one on the head, with a sword, the other with a Lance which razed the skin of his bellie, made the victorie for a while doubtful. Without doubt his braue resolution and wife command encouraged many that were amazed, and confirmed that, which in shewe tended to ruine. The onely feare which they had, least he had more men in the village or thereabouts, then hee had made shew of, kept the enemy backe, and made them to attend the rest of the army which aduanced: in the meane time they put them into

An aduenturous charge.

A five esquadrons. His Maiestie sees himselfe engaged to fight, and hath small meanes to make it good, for the troupes followed easily, and the houre of the Rendezvous was not yet come. The King notwithstanding aduanceth a troupe of horse which newly arrived. But discouering this great cloud of enemies ready to charge them, they retyre to his Maiestie.

One torch may kindle many lights. If our Henry had wanted resolution: if his valour had not beene able to heat these cold and frozen hearts: if numbers had exceeded his courage, he had beene wonderfully perplexed. It was a shame to retyre, a rashnes to aduance, and dangerous to make a stand. There was perill to fight, or not to fight. Hee choseth rather to exceed the limits of valour, then to bee noted of any cowardise. He aduanceth to them that fled, and causeth some to turne & to ioyne with his troupe. The Lord of Tauannes arriues with his companie, increasing his number, which are about two hundred horse, but not yet well ioyned. Hereupon the Duke of Mayenne appeares vpon a hill, and sends forth three esquadrons against his Maiestie, which flank-ed him on the right hand, the one of 300 horse, the other of 200, & the third of a hundred and fiftie, and two others against the Marshall of Biron.

The King aduanceth, with about foure score horse, & chargeth the first squadron so violently, as he giues them no leisure to thinke to fight, ouerthrowes the second, and dispereth the third, with about fife and twentie horse, which remayned with him (the rest pursued the victorie) strikes terror into all, and leaues the vanquished no other safety, but to die by the hands of so incomparable a Conqueror. The Marshall of Biron seconds this admirable victorie with a great resolution, who followed with about fiftie horse, defeated the two esquadrons that came against him, one after another, within threescore paces of the Duke of Mayenne, who stood firme on the hill with his troupe of three hundred horse, whether the runaways fled, thinking there to bee in safetie.

The King and the Marshall charge them ioynly, force them, put them in rout, and pursue them vnto the corner of the wood. Here the King finds their battallions of foot, and great store of muskets and other shot planted alongst it, with foure hundred fresh horse, sent to receiue the Duke, a hundred paces from their battallions. So his Maiestie makes a stand, and the enemies freed from him begin their retreat. The Kings horse follow them to the top of the hill, and there put themselves in battell. The Kings hauing taken breath in the place from whence hee parted to go to the charge, diuides his men into two troupes, one for himselfe, the other for the Marshall. Here, about a hundred French gentlemen take the place from fiftene hundred horse, and by this meanes the King was master both of the enemies bodies, and of the place of battaile. His Maiestie gathers together such as were disperd, to make the better shew. Hereupon arriues the Earle of Clarmont, Vitry, the Kings light horse, those of Cesar Monsieur, the Duke of Elbeuf, the Earle of Chiuerny, the Cheualier of Oise, the Lord of Risse and Six, which made about six hundred horse of his ordinary, all greened that they had not followed the fortune & valour of our King, to be partakers of the honor which he had wonn.

With this supplie hee turnes to ouertake them that fled, and pursues them two Leagues, neere vnto Grey: but not able to follow this shamefull flight hee was content his glorie should surmount their shame, and that his valour had vanquished their force. And vsing this famous victorie with pietie, hee let all the world know in his person, That it is not the sword, nor the arme that strikes, nor the number of men, that preserues Kings in the midst of armes: but that high Providence, which fighting with the one hand for the iust cause of lawfull Princes, against the attempts, and violences of Tyrants and Tyrants: and holding victories in the other, decides the quarrels of States: by the equitie hee finds in Princes aimes vnjustly oppressed, and makes it manifest that the admirable euent of battailes consisteth and relie not onely in number or force, but in the free disposition of his fauours: vnto a people whose miseries he will shorten, which the continuance of war hath bred in a diuided Estate.

The enemy returned to lodge at Saint Seine, and dislodging the next day with a feare, they repassed the water vpon their bridges, leauing both the one and the other side of the hill at the Kings deuotion, who without doubt had giuen them a great check vpon this retreat, if his footmen had bene with him, and the horses lately armed could haue endured the toyle in the vehement heat of the sunne.

The Duke of Mayenne and the Castilian lost in this charge fixe score men slaine vpon the field, three score prisoners, and two hundred hurt. His Maiestie, onely tounge slaine, and one prisoner. But for a notable circumstance, and a signe of the especiall care of God ouer his person, hee performed these exploits without any other armes then his cuirasse alone, and was well assisted (to their great commendation) by the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf, the Lord of Tremouille, and the Marqueses of Treynel and Pizany, by the Lords of Inteuille, Roquelauve, Chasteauvieux, Liencourt, Montigni, Mirapoux and others. And in despite of all the furious attempts of the League, the Castell of Dijon, and in a manner all Bourgogne was sone after reduced to the Kings obedience: and now the third time, hee freed his realme from strangers. The King in the end inuades the County, forceth one of their lodgings in the vew of the Constable of Castille neere vnto Grey, becomes master of the field, takes Aspremont and many other places: he had forced their cheefe forts, if the Suiffes had not intreated him to rectyre his army, and to suffer that Prouince to inioy her ancient libertie.

Whilest the King continues his victories, the Marshall of Bouillon executes a dangerous enterprize, but of importance vpon the Towne and Castell of Han. Han opened the way for the Spaniard from the frontier vnto Beauuais and Amiens: but this surprize cunningly performed, did wonderfully annoy them, and not one Spaniard of those which had it in gard escaped either death or prison. Six score naturall Spaniards, and six or seuen hundred Captaines and souldiars of diuerse nations were slaine, and three or foure hundred prisoners. But all this scumme of men could not recompence the dearch of that braue and generous Nohleman de Humieres, one of the cheefe actors in the enterprize, as much lamented first by the King, then by the Nobilitie, and generally of all France: as his vertues and merits had made him commendable and necessarie for his Maiesties seruice. La Croix master of the campe, Mazieres Lieutenant to Surville, and Boycourt Captaine of Humieres gard, were companions of his valour, and graue. The Towne was taken for the King, with the death of sometwentie other gentlemen, and about a hundred souldiars.

But the Spaniard soone after reuenged this surprize vpon Castelet, but more sharply vpon the Towne of Dourlans, for hauing put to rout the succours which the Marshall of Bouillon sent, slaine the Admirall of Villars and many gentlemen, they took the Towne by assault (not for want of men or munition, but by their bad order, and the intelligence which the Commanders in the Towne had with the enemy) and entred it with such great furie, as they had no respect of sex or age: hauing no reason for their horrible crueltie, but the fresh remembrance of their companions. It is (cried they) to reuenge those of Han.

The Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Bouillon, and the Earle of Saint Paul, Commanders of the Kings troups, hauing diuided the charge amongst them, to encounter the Spanish forces, the Marshall and the Earle went to provide for the places about Bollogne, and the Duke for those vpon the riuer of Somme. Passing by Amiens, hee finds the people and the cheefest so amazed, that to assure them, he was forced to lay aside the qualities of his person, and to promise to put himselfe into Corbie, foure Leagues from Amiens, to defend it if the enemy approched. He enters it the third of August, vewes it both within and without, takes a suruay of the quantitie of munition, and of the number of monethes, and prouids, as time and necessitie would permit him for things necessary for the preseruacion of the place. The Spaniard had another dessein: for the first day of the moneth hee parts from about Dourlans, and taking the way betwixt Peronne and Corbie, seemes to threaten Saint Quentin or Cambray.

So

A So the Duke leaues Corbie, but doubtfull whither the Spaniard went: yet aduertised by the Viconte d'Auchy gouernor of Saint Quentin, that the enemy approched towards him, he goes to defend Saint Quentin. He is no sooner armed, but newes come, that the Earle of Fuentes is lodged about Cambray, to beseege it with teauenteene thousand men, and threescore and two peeces of artillery. The Lord of Balagny, Marshall of France, by his articles of capitulation with the King, confirms this aduice by his letters of the eleuenth, tweluth, thirteenth, and foureteenth daies of the moneth, and requires to bee sodenly releued, for the pittifull Estate of Dourlans terrified the people: the towne was ill prouided of men, this huge number of Cannons, and this fearefull multitude of men, strooke a generall terror among the Citizens.

B But to reuiue their spirits, who were ready to yeeld obedience to a newe Lord, the Duke of Neuers sends them his only sonne the Duke of Kethelois, assisted with the valour and wisdom of the Lords of Vicques, Buby, Trumelet, Vandecourts, Sugny, Fleury, Chaltray, and others with about three hundred and fittie horse. The Pelants by their bells giue the alarum from village to village, and a paltrie bridge of woode at Anne, two Leagues from Cambray; staying their troupe, gaue the Earle of Fuentes meanes to put his horse in battaile almost directly in the way the Duke should take. Hee auoids it, and going aside encounters a gard of fife and twentie Lances, making a stand on this side of a hollow-way: hee chargeth them, cuts them in peeces in the sight of their horse, which could not succour them by reason of the sayd way, and passing on, hee falls into a troupe of two hundred and fiftie horse, marcheth directly to them, scatters them, goes on his way, and comes to the towne ditch. The Inhabitants knowe him and receiue him with much honor, and ioye to see so braue succors.

C But it was too weake against such a number of assaillants: The King was farre off, the Estate of Bourgundie kept him occupied: the affaires of the Prouince of Lionois required his presence. The Inhabitants of Cambray beganneto decline in affection: they were malcontent with the tediousnesse of the sege, and the ruine of their houses by the Cannon, and of the constraint to take certaine money made of Copper, and not suffer them to imploye it, carrying on the one side the Kings armes as Protector, and on the other those of the Lord of Balagny, created Prince of Cambray by the articles of his reddition. On the other side the enemy made strange attempts, and gaue horrible threats against the beseeged. They shut their eares against all perswasions, and make a disloyall resolution to yeeld, and hoping for better vsage and more liberty, they open the gates to the enemy. The Duke of Rethelois, Balagny and Vicques, and others flie into the Cittadell. The Duke would retire his sonne, and makes the beseeged despaire of any speedie succors. So the ninth of October Balagny signed the capitulation, offered by the enemy: but with so much great greefe and sorrowe, as the same night he signed it, his wife being a woman of a great spirit, died, not able to endure that so precious a Jewell as Cambray (whereof shee was newly created Princeesse) should fall into the Spaniards cruell hands.

Thus this ancient member of this Crowne was lost: Thus the onely triumphe of a sonne and brother of the Kings of France was blemished. Doubtlesse had it not bene for the impatiencie and disloyalty within, and the fault of some great men that might haue preuented this mischiese, all their attempts had bene in vaine: for the Earle of Fuentes was ready to build forts about the towne, rather to vanquish then by a long sege then by assault. And the King hastned his entry into Lions, to come to their speedie succour. The Duke of Neuers died soone after, greeued on the one side for so great a breach made to this Estate, and satisfied on the other, that his sonne had shewed himselfe so valiant in the conduct of the succors hee put into the towne.

to hazard a battaile, hee went and made his entry into Lions the fourth of September. A assured the Prouince, provided for the troubles of Prouence, nourished not so much by the League, as by the discontentments and partialities of some which had no integritie with them: he receiued Bois Dauphin to his obedience, with the townes of Châteaugontier in Anion, and Sable in Maine, and for recompence of his seruice, honoured him with the place of a Marshall of France. Then he granted a generall truce throughout the whole realme, to the Duke of Mayenne, which after so many stormes, and many tempestes, shall in the end bring vs to a safe port, so necessary to quiet the diuisions of this realme.

God rayseth vp a great meanes from beyond the mountaynes, to make them easie for a generall peace and reunion of people distracted from his maiesties obedience. The Pope moued in the end to see the eldest sonne of the Church, and the chiefe Christian Prince prostrate at his seete, shewes himself a true father of iustice, to vanquish the difficulties and oppositions, whereby the Ambassador of Spain had croit his Maiesties constant and iust pursuit, since the time of his conuersion. The 18. of September hee opens the streames of his blessings vpon our Kings head: and all the Colledge of Cardinals, all the people, all the City of Rome, crye out with that happy acclamation, God saue Henry of Bourbon, King of France and of Nauarre, most great, most Victorious, God saue the most Christian and most Catholike, God saue the chiefe sonne of the Church.

Fewe daies after the newes of this sollemne action, the King went from Lions in post by night, to go to the succor of Cambraye, but the effects were not answerable to his care and good will. The Cambresiens had already conceiued some hope of greater liberty: they hoped to get much by the change, and yeelded their neckes to a new command. There is neyther meanes, counsell, nor reason, that can stay a multitude, when as a disordred appetit of freedome doth transport them.

His Maiestie findes other worke to imploy his forces: he fought to roote this forren power speedely out of Picardie, which held his hands bound, and insulted ouer him: La Fere is the chiefe and most important fort of the Prouence: hee beseegeth it and finds therein an obstinate and inuincible resolution. Perseuerance is necessary in all sorts of warfarre, but especially in the leege of townes: and there is no place which munition and the situation makes impregnable, but time and famine will force, subdue and bring vnder. Whilest the king leaues the beseege nothing free but the aire, and driues them to all extremities, the Duke of Mayenne on the other side (seeing his retreats in a manner all lost, and that he is in disgrace with the Spaniards;) flies for his Maiesties fauour, and vpon his simple word he promisseth to come vnto him wheretoeuer hee pleased. The Marquis of Sorlin, now Duke of Nemours, by the death of his elder brother, yeelds with the like facility.

Neuer Prince did more easi yemit the wrongs were done him. The King grewe more cold then was requisite in a sege of such importance, to attend the treaties of the one and the other. He commended the first, for the affection hee had shewed to preserve the realme entire hauing not done, nor suffered it to bee dismembred, but of some places, in the great declining of his Estate, & declares that he had alwaies heard that the second had no part in the troubles and diuisions of the realme, by any deseme preiudiciall to the Estate. This reunion of the Duke of Mayenne cauted the yeelding of Soissons, Pierrefont, Chaulon vpon Saone, Seurre in Burgongne, and some other places, to the Kings obedience, who in like sort (to giue order to the disorders of Brittaine, a Prouince all couered with Spaniards vnder Don Iohn d'Aghigliar;) sent the Marshall of Lauerdin thither after the death of the Marshall d'Aumont.

The hazard and burthens of rebellion, ruined the Duke of Angoulême onely: he would be more willfull then all the rest. He therefore grew so incited against him, as the Court of Parliament at Paris made his proceffe, declared him guilty of treason in the highest degree, his picture to bee drawne in peeeces with foure hortes, all his goods forfeited to the King, adiudged his goodly house at Anet to be razed to the ground, and for

A for more detestation of his treachery, the Trees about it cut off by the waste. But he fought his safety with Albert Cardinall of Austria at Bruxelles, lately come to succeed the Archduke Ernest his brother. 1595.

Albert assures the besieged in La Fere, to free them, but he suffered the succours that should releue them to bee defeated. And the Earle of Fuentes hauing manned the Townes of his new conquest, went to winter in Haynault; and gaue the King meanes to diuise most part of his horse, to be ready in the spring against the Cardinals designs. In the meane time he assembled the Estates of Picardie, Bolognois, Fernandois and Thierache in Amiens, provided for the estate of the Prouince, and punished some Captaines with death, whole courtouinesse had partly bene the cause of the former losses.

Whilest that our Henry assisted now by the Duke of Mayenne in person, bring them of La Fere to be ready to submit vnto his Maiestie, behold the beginning of this new yeare, sowes the seeds which shall bring forth most profitable fruites, for the perfect restoring of this estate. The Townes and whole prouinces, desire a generall deliuerie, and nothing stayes the effects, but that some Gouernours will haue the honour, to see the Canon at their gates, before they treat of their accord: others set their places to sale. A filthy traffick, fitte for the confusion of this age, but vnworthy of all good order, vnworthy the duty of good subiects, vnworthy of the liberie and honour of the French Nobilitie. The King reducing them by force, which will not voluntarily returne to their duties, hee wisely giues eare to the mildest and shortest course. Hee should spend more money to get more honour, but hee frames himselfe after the example and modell of Charles the tenth, whose two raignes had many conformities. He desires rather to buy a place for money, then to besiege it with much more charge, and great losse of men. The people suffer great losse, and oft times the issue is doubtfull.

The first fruites of this new yeare are most happy in generall, and most honourable for the chiefe authors thereof. The Duke of Joyeuse holds the first ranke. It is hee which hath lately taken againe his profession of a Capuchin, wherevnto he was vowed after the death of his wife: and by the decease of the last Duke of Joyeuse his brother, (drowned neere to Villemur;) had left him to succeed in the name, gouernement and estate of the deceased. Without attending of any force, he yeeldes freely to his Maiesties seruice, and the King opening his armes and heart, makes him partaker of his especiall fauours, honouring him with the title of Marshall of France, and one of his Lieutenants generall in Languedock, in the Townes, places and countries, hee brings to his obedience: giuing him this testimonie, that the onely zeale and profession of his religion, had made him take armes, without any other pretension whatsoever.

By his example, the officers of the Court of Parliament, remaining at Tholouse for the exercise of Iustice, the Capitoulx and all the rest of the Cittizens, together with all other people of the Prouince of Languedoc, which held the contrary party vnder the authority of the sayd Duke, make knowne vnto the King, the desire they haue to yeeld obedience and duty to his Maiestie, and their resolution to perseuer therein.

The Duke of Guise did second this happy beginning of the yeare, and doth sweeten the sharpnesse of those losses which the Spaniard had caused vs lately to suffer. Hee was still vigilant to imbrace all occasions that might settle his affaires in his gouernment of Prouence, wherewith the King had newly honoured him, hauing already, with the helpe of the Lord of Les Diguieres, reduced Cisteron and Riez to the obedience of this Crowne, and Martegues with the Tower of Bouc, seated at the mouth of the sea, the Towne and citadell of Grasse, with the helpe of the Earle of Cavares, and the Lord of Croze: hee findes a fitte oportunitie, to make knowne vnto his Maiestie, that hee had quite forsaken the alliance and correspondence which hee had with the Spaniard.

Tholouse

1556. Lewis of Aix and Charles of Casau commanded in Marfeilles with great authority: violent men and of the Spanish faction. They bargained with Phillip to sell him this Towne of importance, the port of all the Prouince, and the key of one of the chiefe entries of this realme, where the Emperour Charles had often knockt, yet could neuer get it open, and for the execution of their desseine, had already cauted some Spanish galleies to approach, vnder the commaund of Prince Charles Doris of Genes. At last as were fled out of Marfeilles, propounded some enterprises vpon the Towne to the Duke of Guise, but all were weake and of small possibilitie, yet had he purchased some reproch to faile in his seruice to the King, if he had not attempted some one. Peter of Liberta commanded at port Reale: a man of courage, valiant, and full of affection to the Kings seruice. He acquainted the Duke of Guise with his resolution, either to kill or to shew out these two Tribuns, who euery morning at the opening of the gates went with their gards to walke without the Towne: that laying an ambush neere vnto the gate, it would be easie to seize on them, to bee masters of the port, and so consequently of the Towne.

The Duke thinks well of this enterprize: hee takes the name of the gate and of the person, for a signe of good fortune. The gate is called royall, and the libertie which the Predecessors of the vndertaker had in old time purchased to the towne of Calus in Corsequa from whence they came, had deserued this goodly surname of Liberta. But the Dukes neere abroad at Aix, held these two pettie Tyrants in perpetuall distrust. To free them of this iealousie he retires from Marfeilles, to employ his forces in some place which might breed no distrust in them. He doth therefore beleage and take the townes of Hieres, Saint Tropez and Draguignan: blockes vp the Citadels, vndertakes the siege of La Garde, a small Towne, but with a strong Castell, which the Duke of Effernon held, being a corruall to the Duke of Guise, in the gouernment of Prouence: batters the place, makes a breach, and giues two assaults, and euen when as they held him farre engaged at this siege, he riseth, retyers his Canon, comes to Toulon the fifteenth of February, giues the Rendezuous to all his troupes, at tenne of the clocke at night, at S. Iulian two Leagues from Marfeilles: hee approacheth, and sends his sentinels of horte before to aduertise him of the signe which Liberta should giue him, which was to shut the wicket after the Tribunes, or one of them as occasion serued.

It was faire day, when as these Consuls, aduertised that they had discovered fiftene souldiars, two hundred paces from the gate, Lewis of Aix goes forth, and to discover them, he causeth twentie muskets of his gard to aduance. Barthlemew of Liberta apers to the wicket, and shuts Lewis out and Casau within. Manon Leader of the Dukes sentinels, seeing the signe giuen, sends eight horsemen to charge these musketiers, and aduanceth with the rest towards the gate by another way: the footmen present themselves to the charge, as was resolved, but in stead of good reception, the Cannon and small shot playes on them from the Towne.

Casau meaning to go forth with his gards to follow his companion, Peter of Liberta thrusts him sodainly through the bodie: his musketiers charge Liberta: his brothers assist him, the Captaines Heruiem, Laurence, Imperiall and some few others, to whom he had imparted the enterprize, disperse these gards, and set vpon the gate, crying liberty by the King: and by the authoritie of this name assured many which were vncertaine what partie to follow: then with Liberta they set themselves to gard the port. Lewis of Aix seeing himselfe shut out, and these vnkowne men comming to charge him, found meanes to get over the walls, and to enter the Towne by a boat which he found happily, and being accompanied by Fabio of Casau, the sonne of Charles that was slaine, & five hundred of his friends and Partisans, he comes to force the gate on the Towne side: but being repulsed, hee goes to the Corps de gard that was before the Towne house. Here by some rumor that he heares, he takes an impression of the peoples ill affection towards him. To free himselfe, he makes shew to go to the other gards, and so goes to sea with Fabio, to get Saint Victors fort, and to assure himselfe of the rest. Some of his friends march after him, some disperse themselves in the Towne, and some

A some begin to cry, God saue the King and Liberty. It rayned soare, and the Duke of Guise amazed at this long protraction in the towne, thinking the intelligence had bene double, thought to retire his men engaged in fight, against the mulketiers of Lewis of Aix, when as Imperiall and Laurence come to assure him that Casau was slaine. Then began his troupes to march into the towne, and for his better assurance the President Bernardin in the open streete assembles what honest men he could, and ioynes with the Dukes men, promisseth them that were armed before the towne-house, life, liberty, & freedome: then going to another gard neere to the hauen, & to Saint Johns Church, where at the first broyle about a thousand men were together in armes, by meanes of the like promise, hee easily drew all this multitude to found forth that happy cry. God saue the King and Liberty.

These two troupes being assured, they visit three or foure other gards, whose attempts were to be feared: some they change, doubting such as Commanded, leaving such as they knewe desired to bee freed from the commande of strangers. So as in lesse then an houre and a halfe, they were all dispersed that lately fauoured this new tyrannic. Thus the flower de Luce, which an vnholme wende from Spaine had till now blasted at Marfeilles, recovered their ancient beauty, and the white scarfes which feare had kept in their cofers, or made them to reiect, were now put on.

Charles Doris growes amazed. Hee dreames of nothing but of his retreat: but so surprisid as he forgot part of his company. The hauen seemed too little to carry forth their least cock-boate, feare and amazement had so daunted them. The Captaine of Saint Johns Tower, and that of the Moores head, might haue stayed them, or at the least hindred their escape: but they were stroken with the like terror, expecting the last act of this Tragedie.

The Seigneur of Bausset, Captaine of the Castell d' If, sought to annoy the stranger with his Cannon, but being farre off hee did them small hurt. Lewis of Aix had thrust himselfe into Saint Victors Abbey, and Fabio of Casau, into our Ladie of la Garde, but so amazed as they could not thinke of their owne safeties. Twelue hundred Spaniards being along the hauen, retyred to enter into their Gallies: but this generall terror had so daunted them, as they saue themselves without any remembrance of their men. The Duke of Guise chargeth them by the Baron of Sel, Lieutenant of his companie of men at armes, and la Pierre Captaine of his gards, who slue a great number vpon the place, and got about a thousand muskets, harguebuzes and pikes, and the onely Enseigne which they had, which feare made them forget to their great shame and confusion. The Duke entering into Marfeilles without any troupe, made knowne vnto the people the largenes of his affection, and the assurance he had of them: he confirmed all things for the Kings seruice, disappointed the desseins of the factious which remayned in the towne, and by his presence did so amaze all the garrisons thereof, with the Towers and forts, as they submitted themselves to his discretion, and obeyed the King.

Doublelesse this young Duke wonne much honour in this action, namely that the souldiars entered without effusion of blood and without spoile, retrayned by the respect of his presence, they were contented to haue the houses of Aix and Casau for their booty. On the other side those of la Fere (having nothing free but the aire which cannot be kept from prisoners) suffred (with the hope of succors) the extremest discomfort which might afflicte a place strictly besieged. The Cardinall of Austria (newly come from Spaine into Flanders) promised to deliuer them. Men supposed this Prince hauing made no profession of a military life, would finde small credit among martiall men, who rather followe actions then words, and the example then discipline.

But hee will teach vs that the surest stroakes come from the head: and if the olde Duke of Guise could by a gallant stratageme recover a towne from the English most important for the Estate of this Crowne, he in like sort by the like exploit will make himselfe selfe the terror of all Picardie. Hee departs from Bruxells, and giues it out that hee A will succor la Fere. For his first fruites, he findes meanes to giue them some reliefe of men and munition in March. Then in Aprill he causeth his army (being very strong) to turne head towards Calais, beseegeth, batters, and takes both towne and Castell by assault, against all the resistance of the beseeged, and puts many French gentlemen to the sword, being sent to supply the Castell.

The Senechal of Montmart commanding the French, and Aluarez Osorio the Spaniards in la Fere, hauing for the space of five monethes endured all the toyles of warre, and seene the river within the towne to rise two or three foote by the labour of men, had the 22. of the sayd moneth, by a good composition, some-what recompensed this so notable a losse, if the Cardinall had planted here the limits of his victories. But contynuing the prosperitie of his armies, whilest the Kings are weary, and demand rest after so great toyle, hee goes in the beginning of Maye, and camps before Ardes, a very strong towne, and notwithstanding their great defence, became Master thereof the 23. of the moneth, and resolves to people these townes of his newe Conquest with strange Colonies, and prepares to adde vnto them, that of Hulst in Flanders. In the meane time the two armies spend the rest of the Sommer in light roads one in to an others Country.

In the beginning of September the Marshall of Biron enters Arthois, takes the Castell of Imbercourt, encounters with five Companies of horse of the Marquis of Varambon followed by five or sixe hundred horse of combat, chargeth them, hee kills all that seeke to withstand the violence of his armes, puts the rest in route, takes the Marquis prisoner & afterwards had fortie thousand Crownes for his ransom: filled the whole Country with feare: then inuading the County of Saint Paul, he tooke and spoyed the towne and some other places.

The Cardinall busied at the siege of Hulst, hearing that the Marquis was taken, hee sent the Duke of Arfoit to commande in his place. As hee enters into Aras, the French assaile it on the other side, spoile the Country about it, and (laden with bootie) the Marshall retires safely to the frontiers of Picardie. Being discharged, hee retournes to Bapaume, spoiles Hebuterne, Benuiller, Courcelles and other places, defeats such as would make resistance, and carries away more spoile then at the first. And seeing the Duke of Arfoit incamped neere to Aras, vnder the fauour of the Cannon, intrenched carefully and loath to hazard any thing, knowing that he was to deale with one of the happiest and most valiant warriors of Europe, they fire all, and reuenge (as oportunitie would suffer them) the Spaniards outrage in places lately taken: they make a roade towards Beihune and Therouenne, bring away many prisoners, furnish thein places with Cattell at the enemies cost, and without any resistance go and campe in the plaine of Azincourt.

The Duke supplied with eight hundred foote, ioyned to the regiment of Colonel Bourlote, parts from Aras the 5. of October, and goes and incamps at Saint Paul. The Marshall leaves him there, retournes into Arthois runnes vnto Douay, spoiles all: then returning into Picardie, hee gaue the Duke of Arfoit meanes to recouer the Castell of Himbercourt: who content with this conquest dismisseth his army, and disposed of his companies into garrisons. Then by the meanes of the Duke of Bouillon the alliance was confirmed and sworne betwixt the King, the Queene of England, and the v-nited Prouinces of the Lowe Countries.

For matters past there is no remedie: and the Politicians hold, that there is no Lawe more vnprofitable, then that which tends to reforme what is past. The King therefore to settle his affaires, and to prouide for the future, resolute not to suffer the newe Colonies of Dourlans, Capelle, Castelet, Cambray, Calais and Ardes, and with the newe year, to renew a deadly warre against the Spaniard, which might not bee attempted without a mighty army, nor the army leuied without treasure, the which he could not recouer without the helpe of his subiects, hee assembled, in manner of a Parliament, the greatest and most discrete of the three orders of his realme, at ROMAN, the fourth of

A Nouember, where the Inhabitants, of their owne voluntarie free will, spent foure hundred thousand Crownes to make his Maiestie an honorable reception, where he received the garter (a badge of the order of England) by the hands of the Earle of Shrewsburie.

His Maiestie desired to deserue these two glorious titles of Deliuerer & Restorer of of his estate. At his coming to the Crowne, hee had found France not onely in a manner ruined, but almost all lost for the French: but by the grace of the Almighty, by the prayers, by the good counsell of his loyall Subiects, who make no profession of armes, by the sword of his Princes and of his braue and generous Nobilitie, by his paines and labour, he had preferued it from losse. Let vs saue it now from Ruine (said our King, speaking to the assembly) Participate my deere subiects with mee in this second glorie, as you haue done in the first. I haue not called you, as my Predecessors did, to make you approue my will. I haue caused you to assemble to haue your Counsells, to beleeue them, and to follow them: finally to put my selfe into your hands. A desire which seldome commaunds Kings that haue white haire, and are Conquerors. But the vehement loue I beare vnto my Subiects, and the exceding desire I haue to adde these two goodly titles, to that of King, makes mee to find all easy and honorable.

The sharpnes of winter had layd armes aside, and the excessive raine caused many inundations, whereof amongst others followed that of the millers bridge at Paris, which sinking on Saint Thomas night, was the losse of three hundred persons, slaine in the ruines of the building, and drowned in the riuer. Whilest they examine the resolutions taken in this honorable assembly, and that the King prepares for a mightie armie to chase the Spaniard out off Picardie, behold the capitall Cittie of this Prouince, strong of seat, and well fortified, where his Maiestie pretended to make his Arcenall and storehouse for the warre against the Stranger in Arthois, and other Prouinces of the Low Countries, was surprised in the day time, the people being at sermon, without force, & without defence, by the practise of some factious, and the carelesse basenesse of the Inhabitants, who standing vpon their ancient priuileges, had refused to receiue the Swisses into garrison.

Hernand Teillo Gouvernour of Dourlans for the Spaniard, aduertised that the Cittizens of Amiens (a proud people, and little practised in armes) would not receiue the garrison that the King offered them for the preseruatiou of their towne, hastens the effect of those intelligences he had there, and on munday the tenth of March, hee attyres fortie or fiftie souldiars like peasants, laden with many burthens, and armed vnderneath with daggers, and short peeces, and marcheth with about seuen hundred horse, and five thousand foot: hee layes his ambushes neere vnto the Towne, and the next day sends his disguised souldiars to the gate of Montrescut, following a cart: which being vnder the port cullis, one of the pretended peasants cuts the horie traice, and by the great disorder of the horse, hinders the libertie of the gate. The others presently discover their armes, seize vpon the Corps de gard, and giue a signe to the ambush.

The Ambush comes, horse and foote into the Towne, and goes directly to the market place: the troups enter, take the forts, and seize vpon the Arcenall and munition which the King had lately sent, and in the end compound with the Townesmen for the redeeming of their goods. But at length they had both cloth and siluer, and those of Amiens shall not tast much of the Spaniards commaund, but the sharpnes thereof will make them desire the mildnesse of the French. The great bell of Bessroy did ring at the first tumult, as it was their manner: but fewe were moued thereat. Some heard the sermon, others slept at their ease, and some were contented to shut their shops and to retyre themselves into their houses. The Earle of Saint Paul was then in the Towne, but seeing the small care and indeuour of the Inhabitants to resist this strange inuasion, hee gets himselfe out of Amiens with all speed, and retyres to Corbe.

This

1597 This affront had in shew made the Realme with out all hope of recouerie, and with out meanes to assayle, for the effects of all the Kings desseins seemed quenched in their beginning. They thought Amiens could not bee recovered but by surprise, and that the hope to take it would bee lost with the enterprise, and now the Spaniards began to thinke that Amiens should be the bounds of the Countie of Artois, as in former time vnder Philip Duke of Bourgogne. But when as the affaires require a present remedie, our Henry wants neither courage nor counsell. They were hopes built in the aire.

Amiens besieged.

His Maiestie doth speedely beleagar it, giues order that no greater forces may come to raise vp these mountaines of pride, which built the honor of their nation vpon the shame of such a losse: hee battens it with fine and fortie Cannons, makes the Marshall of Biron Lieutenant in his armie, besiegeth it on the strongest part, restraynes their sallies, keeps them in their trenches, and approcheth in such sort, as by the midst of Iuly, they might hurt one another with stones: then lodging vpon the ditch, and cutting off the besieged daily in their sallies, or by other stratagems, hee made Hermand to hasten the Cardinall to his succour.

All France did runne to this seege: all Europe attended the issue, and did iudge that the end thereof would bee the beginning of our slaerie, or of our libertie. But whilest the plague afflicts the besieged, that many and sundrie exsploirs of warre diminish their numbers, and many remaine vnprofitable, by reason of their wounds, let vs make a walke into some other prouinces both within and without the Realme, whereas their warre hath any thing common with ours.

The want and dearth of victuals afflicted Britanie in the moneth of May, and forced the Marshall of Brissac in Iuly to diuide and separate some troupes which hee had assembled and gathered together, to preserue some parishes about Rennes which the enemies threatned to spoyle. The Lord of Saint Laurence, Lieutenant for the Duke of Mercoeur in his armie, desirous to visit the said Duke lately come to Chasteaubriant, and to giue him newes of some braue stratageme, takes six companies of men at armes with his owne, the regiment of Tremereuc, brother to Saint Laurence, fortie harguebuziers out of euery companie of the garrisons of Dinan, and some other troupes both of horse and foote, making fixe or seuen hundred men, and comes to lodge at Maure, seuen Leagues from Rennes. The Lords of Tremblay, la Troche, Teny, la Courbe, Baumont, and Pomeray, being lodged at Mesjac vpon Villaine, three Leagues from Maure with some forces, marche by the Marshalls commaundement, their Colonel, to fight with Saint Laurence: they find hee was dislodged, follow and ouertake him within three hundred paces, charge the troupe led by Tremereuc, appointed to make retreat, kill about threescore, and force the rest to flie to their maine strength.

They presse them in such sort as they must either suffer themselves to bee murdered without resistance, or else fight: they turne head, take a place of aduantage, in a field well ditched about, and there make some resistance. But seeing Tremereuc brother to Saint Laurence already taken prisoner, La Pomeray Captaine of Dinan, and Vieux Ville flaine vpon the place, with about a hundred and fiftie souldiers, and some members of companies, all giue way, all flie, all are put to rout, and the most part falling into the peasants hands, find lesse mercie with them, then they had done rigour with the victors. This was the twentieth of Iuly.

On the other side, as the Spaniard had set one foote into Picardie, so did hee long labour to cast the other into Champagne, and had many desseins vpon the Townes lying vpon the riuier of Meuse, Mesieres, Sedan, Mouzon, Villefranche, Rocroy, and Maubert-Fontaine: but the care and loyaltie of the gouernors, hauing alwayes made frustrate the hope of his enterprises, hee now conuertts his open force into secret intelligences and dishonest practises.

Villefranche is a very small Towne, or rather a corps de gard made of foure square bastions,

A bastions, built by King Francis the first, to serue as a barre against the incursions of the Bourguignons (so they call all the King of Spaine subjects lying vpon this frontier, and euen those of the Duchie of Luxembourg) and falling into strangers hands, it opened the gate to enter in Champagne, and gaue them an assured retreat to fauour their inroads. To this intent Gaucher, late one of those souldiers which they call of Fortune, being come within ten yeares to some credit by armes, practiseth with some souldiers of the garrison, to sell and deliuer him the place. These souldiers giue eare to this trafficke, entertayne Gaucher, but with as croisse a hope, as his name was victorious and ominous, for they impart the matter to Tremelet Gouernour of Villefranche, commanding one company of men at armes, and three of foot. Tremelet by this trafficke pretends a great effect for the Kings service, committs the souldiers to deale more plainly with this Captaine, imparts it to the Earle of Grandpré, to Rumefnil, and to Esleuainx Gouernors of Mouzon, Maubert, and Sedan, and drawes from them assistance of men, and meanes to frame a double intelligence. These marchants treat with Gaucher, agree vpon the time and houre to deliuer their ware, they receiue some money in hand, and take his word for the rest.

The fourth of August at night was appointed for the execution, and for a signe a Cannon should bee discharged. But Rumefnil had the night before brought in a supply of men, needfull for the preseruatiou of the place, and with the rest he lay in ambush halfe a League from the Towne, as Gaucher should passe. Gaucher approcheth, he causeth all his troupes to light, a quarter of a League from Villefranche, puts a part of them very secretly into the ditch, and followes with the rest, to second the first attempt: but at all aduentures hee causeth his horse to bee led after him. The first enter by fauour of the souldiers: the signe is giuen, and being giuen, those which thought to surprise, find themselves surpris'd: all are put to the sword, consumed by wildfire, or drowned in the ditch. Rumefnil comes out off his ambush at the same time, chargeth Gaucher behind, kills him three hundred men vpon the place, and suffers fewe of the enemies to escape, through fauour of the night: finally, of fixe or sixe hundred men which hee brought, scarce fiftie escaped death or imprisonment, and had it not bin for the horse which Gaucher held readie to fauour his flight, he had not escaped the victors hands.

Gaucher destroyed.

Let vs passe into Sauoie, and see the progresse of the Kings forces, the taking of places, and victories obtained. This warre shall helpe much for the recouerie of Amiens, for they diuert the forces of Sauoie from molesting of the King in sundrie places at once: for the managing whereof, the Lord Les-Diguitiers parted from Court in the end of March, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant Generall, gathers together about sixe hundred horse, and fixe thousand foote, in the moneth of April, May, and Iune: enters into Maurienne a Countie depending on the Duchie of Sauoie, the high way to Piedmont and Italie, surpasseth with much labour and toyle, the difficulties of the wayes, rockes, and steepe hilles: in the end hee reco- enters the toppe of the mountaine, finds there a Corps de gard of fixe hundred men well fortified, and with his tyred armie chargeth them with such furie, as the enemye not able to withstand their force, is contrayned to quit the place. Presently the armie comes to S. John of Maurienne, the cheefe Towne of the Countie, and seizes on all the valley.

Maurienne taken.

These conquests as so dauidely executed, as wisely attempted, thrust on the Conqueror to go and fight with certaine Spaniards which were sent into Flanders to oppose against the prosperous successe of Cont-Maurice: but the bridges being broken, and the waters verie great, stayed his passage. Here vpon newes come, that Dominick Earle of Salins, Generall of the Duke of Sauoies light horse, is about Bras with a part of the Dukes armie. Les Diguitiers marcheth thither, chargeth the Earle, makes him to quit the the Castell of Saint Michell, and some other villages where hee had fortified himselfe, chaseth him by Mont-Senys into Piedmont, and 1597 so hotly, as the most part, to make themselves more light, cast away their armes. A Being thus peaceably possessed of all Maurienne, hee fortifies Saint John and the Castell of Saint Michel, and seisseth on all the forts that might serue for the safety of the Countie.

To stay the Conquerors course, the Duke of Sauoye passed the mountaines, by the valley of Aulpi with three thousand Italians, and a good number of horse, and came by Chambery into Tarentaise, where his armie remayned vnder the command of the Earle of Martingues, consisting of eight hundred horse, and fixe thousand foot: hee came and incamped beyond the riuer of Iser, (yet vnder the fauour of the Cannon of Montmelian) at the Castell of Saint Helene. Les Diguieres continues his conquests, hee approacheth within musket shot of the Duke, beseegeth and takes B the Tower of Aiguebelle, the Castels of Rochette, of Villars-Sallet a house of the Earles of Montmaieur, of Lhuile and Chamoux, and beseegeth the fort of Chamouffet, being defended by Philippin bastard brother to the Duke of Sauoy, places very commodious and profitable for victuals and forrage, and which stoppt the passage from Sauoy into Maurienne.

Here newes comes to Les Diguieres that the Duke raiseth a fort on the other side of Iser, to assure the passage for his army, and meanes to lodge at Chamouffet, a place of great aduantage for him, which might greatly annoy the kings army, & the passage betwixt Dauphiné and it. This fort was of a triangular forme, made defence and raised the height of a pike in one night, it was garded by fixe hundred choise soldiers C out of the whole armie of Sauoy, and fortified with many gentlemen of the Dukes Court. Les Diguieres views it, and propounds it in Councell, and according to their aduice that were about him, sautes it with some vollees of Cannon shot, opens it at one point, sends two thousand harguebuziers, commaunded by the Lord of Crequy his sonne in law, who seconded by a troupe of horse, enter furiously into the fort, and in despite of their obstinate resistance, and the force of foure peeces which played incessantly from the other side of the riuer along the flanks of the said fort, they carried it in sight of the Duke, and kill by the sword and water about foure hundred men, and many of the Dukes gentlemen, who was in person in his armie beyond the riuer of Iser, and so razed the fort. The Baron of Chautriren borne in D the Countie was slaine there, the Colonnell was taken prisoner, and the Castell of Chamouffet yeelded the next day by composition. The Towre of Charbonniere, a place strong of situation, which couers Aiguebelle, and might bee made fit to annoy Montmelian, seeing their Captaine and many others slaine with the Cannon, came likewise into the victors power.

The Castell of Aignille remayned yet, a strong place both by nature and art, vpon the side of a mountaine, inaccessibile of one side, hauing on the other side a double ditch, with a thicker rampart betwixt both. Yet was it taken after two hundred Cannon shot. This place assured all Maurienne, and that which lies beyond Iser, to his Maiesties obedience, from Mont Senys vnto Montmelian. The supplies the Duke expected, caused the Lances of Sauoy to remaine in quiet. Being now fortified with E two thousand fixe hundred Suisses, and as many Spaniards and Neapolitans, hee comes with all this army to lodge about Montmelian, and resolues to set vpon the Kings army.

To free him of some part of this trouble, Lesdiguieres turnes towards him with his forces, and comes to incampe at Mollettes halfe a league from Montmelian, the riuer of Iser being betwixt them. The Duke passeth the riuer vpon a bridge of boates made nere vnto that of Montmelian, and lodgeth at the Castell of Saint Helene, right against Molette, places some-what high and within Cannon shot one of an other, separated by a great meadow and a fenne: at the first they salute one another by skirmishes: and if the Sauoisians had done what they might, they had greatly annoyed F our men, who were not lodged nor scarce arriued. The night approaching ended the combate,

A combat with the losse of a hundred good men, and gaue meanes to the Kings troupes to take breath, and prepare to be reuenged with vsurie. The next day the Duke shewes fifteene thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, in battaile in this great meadow, but with such aduantage, as no man might charge them. Les Diguieres intrencheth himselfe at the foote of the meadow: euery master of the campe, euery Captaine takes his quarter, and by the care of the Lord of Crequy commaunding the foote, the Kings campe was in short time out of present danger, which seemed to threaten their ruine. In the meane time they faile not on either side to trie their swords, and pistols, two to two, three to three, troupe to troupe, and nothing but a simple ditch, yet deepe and full of water, keepest the two armies from a bloodie fight,

B Thus for some dayes these warriours inflamed their resolutions, when as the Duke of Sauoy propounded to his Councell a great desseine, for the execution whereof the fourteenth of August by eight of the clocke in the morning, he secretly drawesthree thousand men into a great wood, neere to the trenches of the Kings armie, lodgeth his Suisses with a battaillon of foot on an other side, sets his horse in a vallie, and encouraging them by his presence, causeth about two of the clocke, a Canon to be discharged, for a signe of a cruell and bloodie battaile, but fuller of passion then of iudgement. The losse fell vpon himselfe: the Kings troupes, both horse and foot, were with a firme resolution prepared to withstand their force. They come to skirmish: the noyle of the Cannon drownes all other sounds, the fire of the shott inflames the ayre and seemed C for fixe houres together to dazell the light of the Sunne. The meadow is couered with dead carcasses, the enemies blood dyes the brooks, and inflames our men to fight. The Seigneur of Crequy receiues a musket shot in the right arme: but the Lion is chafed and stormes at the sight of his owne blood. So retyring himselfe apart vnder a tree to be drest, hee returnes speedily to his companions, and burning with a generous heat of reuenge, shewes that he is a right heire, both in blood and vertue to that braue Lord of Pentdormy, who hath so often heretofore died his sword and arme in the blood of the stranger being enemy to this Crowne. About twelue hundred men slaine or hurt made the day famous, and made the Sauoisien loose all desire to trie any more the firme resolution of our men, grounded vpon the right of a most iust offensive warre.

D If all this great armie, neither by the thunder of their Cannons, nor the furie of their shot, neither by the force of their men at armes, could any thing shake the constancie of our men, doth Colonnell Ambrose thinke to preuaile more with fixe hundred natural Spaniards assailing a Corps de gard, placed on the side of a fenne? but he doth increase their shame, in stead of reuenging their publike losse. The Seigneur of Bianme and Poet receiue him with such resolution, as they kill a hundred and fiftie vpon the place, and take many prisoners: the rest they force to cast away their armes, to bee the more light to flie. The Duke spent the night to burie his men, and to carrie away the wounded: then hee dislodged the sixteenth, and went to lodge at a village called Barraux beyond Iser, at the entry of the valley of Grisuandant towards Grenoble, and there begins a fort, E busying himselfe in the building thereof vnto the end of Nouember.

This change of lodging inuited our men to do the like. Les Diguieres comes to lodge at Castel Bayard, and his armie at Pont-Charra, halfe a League from the enemy, the riuer being betwixt them: hee keepest his men in continuall skirmish, to the enemies losse, and by this placing of his campe, makes the enemy doubt that hee would attempt the passage of Eschilles. To crosse him, the Duke sends many troupes to enter by the valley of Pragelas into the Countie of Briançon, and to shut vp the passage in case he were beseeget. The check he receiued counteruailed the first. The water, the sword, and the steepe mountaines, deuoured a great number of his men, then the skirmishes of S. Helene and Molettes.

F Behold a third, which shewes that God doth fauour the iust cause of armes, and makes their effects happie against the iniustice of vsurpers. The eight of September, the Lord Les Diguieres (who lets not slip any occasion) is aduertised that Sanches Earle of Salines, (to draw him to succour his owne Prouince, and to leaue Sauoy) 1597 goes to spoyle about Grenoble with five hundred maisters diuided into two bands of horse.

At La Frette.

At Chaparouillon.

To adde this victory to the former, hee sends two houres before day, the Regiments of Basme, Authun and Saint Ieuze with two hundred horse, and a hundred Carabins to lie in ambush in an Island in the midst of the river of Isere. At the breake of day, the Earle passeth in sight of them: they suffer him to aduance about halfe a League, then they issue forth of their ambush, and wade through the other part of the river to their sadle skirts, they ouertake the Earle at La Frette, charge him furiously, kill Dom Ichn de Sequano first Captaine of the horse, Dom Roario, Dom Probio, with many other Commaunders and men at armes, to the number of two hundred: and by the taking of Dom Euangeliste, who led the second troupe, of the Earle of Galinari, of Dom John Toc, brother in law to the Earle, and threescore others, they end the combat, and returne with honour, hauing lost but sixe men in this bold encounter. Some dayes after, the Lord Les Diguieres passeth the river with most part of his horse, at Chaparouillon, and there charging a troupe of the enemies, which made a good shew by the fauour of some trenches, gaue the Seigneurs of Crequi and Buisse the second honor of this victorie.

The last of October, the Kings armie ill lodged at Pontcharra, retyred about Grenoble: from thence Les Diguieres sent foure regiments towards Barcelonne, and surmounting the toyle of the way, being of most hard access for the Cannon, tooke Allost: then in the end of Nouember, Saint Genis, to disapoint the intelligences which the Duke of Sauoie might haue with some ill affected in Daulphiné: for a fewe dayes before the Earle of La Roche had failed by the meanes of Albigny a yonger brother of Gardes, to deliuer the Towne of Romans to the Sauoisien. But Saint Ferriol, that commaunded in his absence, had some inckling: who by the aduertisement he gaue to the Officers of the Parliament, whome the plague had transported to Romans, saved the Towne from the rule of a Stranger.

At S Andre.

The Duke wonderfully grieved to haue failed of Romans, retyres to Chambery, and the Lord of Crequi with some regiments to Maurienne, very happily to make his coming famous: for hauing first by the assistance of the Lord of Pasquieres, kept Dom Amedee the Dukes bastard brother, from passing with his troupes on the side of the mountaines, he made the way open for a braue and generous stratageme. The Earle of Carrual would likewise passe with a regiment of twelue enseignes, & two Cornets of horse. Crequi parts before day from Saint Iohn of Maurienne, marcheth directly towards him, encounters him at Saint Andre, chargeth, defeats, takes him prisoner with all the Commaunders, and for a monument sends their colours and Cornets to the King, which hang yet as a trophie in our Ladies Church at Paris, to his Maiesties great content.

Seige of Amiens.

Let vs now see the countenance of them that were beseeged at Amiens. If there were valour without to winn the wall, there was resolution within to burie themselves in the ruines thereof, rather then to abandon it. The batterie continued with a strange furie. The extraordinary deepe trenches, the sapp and mine, the arruall of the Dukes of Mayerne, Bouillon and Espernon, and the troupes which increased daily, gaue hope to the Citizens of Amiens, soone to see themselves vnder the milde command of their lawfull Prince, and to returne to their ancient fortunes. The sallies, plague, hurts, and other infirmities had diminished the beseeged to the number of two thousand: the diuersitie of nations threatned some new change, the souldiars would no more trust the cunning and vaine promises which Hernando gaue them by counterfeit letters from the Cardinall: the old and bad drogues killed in stead of curing: finally the letter, of Hernand to the Cardinall being intercepted, giues a verie sufficient testimonie of the vrgent necessitie and occasion which leads him to his ruine. It is now time (saied he) that wee cease to write, for I labour with the souldiars and Bourgeois at the ranelin, where within fewe dayes I attend a continuall battery of thee-

A sent on three partes. Mans reason sayles vs: our hope is in God. and in your highnesse 1597. speake coming, to giue bataille, or to receiue it. Wee attend that the second causes should worke.

There is no lesse honour to keepe well, then to make a goodly conquest. To practise this ancient saying, the Cardinall hauing assembled foure thousand horse, and fiftene thousand foote, with eightene Cannons, and five or sixe hundred wagons chained together, to serue as a barricadoe, and to inclose his campe, hee marched to engage or to succor the beseeged, publishing in all places, that he would giue bataille. But before hee approacheth, hee sends to discover the way which he was to take, and where he might lodge nereft to the towne. This charge he gaue to Contreras, Cornisary generall, who led the troupe, to Don Gaston Spinola and Tassedo Marshalls of the Campe, to Don Ambros Lundriano Lieutenant generall of the light horse, Don Iohn de Bracamont, to Colonnel Bourlotte, Nicholas Basto and other chiefe Commanders of his army. These, to giue the lesse alarm, take about foure hundred choise horse, and make a shewe as if they would come but to Dourlans: but they giue order that the troupes of horse at Dourlans, Hesdin and Bapaume should bee readie when they passed.

The Cardinall of Austris Marshall of his Campe defeated.

Thus increased by the sayd garrisons, and making a troupe of nine hundred or a thousand horse, the nine and twentieth of August they come beneath Saint Quirieu, a village vpon the backe of a small riuer, two Leagues from the Kings quarter: and be-
C ginneth to vewe the sayd lodging. A troupe of light horse and Carabins coming from an ambush which they had layed, discover them, and aduertise the King at fixe of the Clocke in the morning.

Behold one of the effects of his Maiesties speedy resolution, of his great iudgement in warre, and his exceeding diligence in his executions. Behold moreouer a patterne of that happinesse which attended him at this sege, and the earnest pennie of an absolute victory which God prepared for him against his enemies. Two alarms had kept the King waking the rest of the night, and hee beganne onely to take a little rest. Hee riseth, goes to horse, having none aboute him but the Master of his horse and some Noble men: he passeth by the Carabins quarter, commands them D to horse: backe with some light horse, commands the Constable to stay in the quarter to giue order to all eients, and goes directly where the enemy had bene discovered, more with an intent to provide for the places which they might haue vnder, then to fight: thinking they would not haue bene so slacke in their retreat, being nere vnto an army led by so vigilant a Commander. The Marshall of Biron comes posting after him: the Lord of Montigny brings a troupe of light horse. Some Noblemen and gentlemen of his Court post thither in hast, to haue their part thereof.

His Maiesty makes a battallion of two hundred horse, and a hundred and fiftie Carabins. He pursues them with all speed to Encre, seauen Leagues from his quarter, hee puts his Carabins before, who seeing themselves seconded by his Maiestie, charge resolutely, and so amaze them, as seeing the King so nere them, and knowing him very well, they breake, and take their flight; diuers waies, leaving them that were appointed for the retreat, or such as were not well mounted. There were about forty slaine at the first charge, and about two hundred of the best being prisoners, gaue the Carabins meanes to furnish themselves with horse, armes, and apparell.

To make this victory absolute, his Maiestie sends the Marshall of Biron with the Lord of Montigny before, and halfe his troupe with them: the other hee keeps with himselfe, pursues them within a League of Bapaume, tithes their troupe by the way, and E doth not abandon them vntill they came within vewe of their retreat: hee takes two Cornets from them, and kills or takes five hundred horsemen.

The generall ioye thereof in the army brought the newes vnto the beseeged, Xxxx 4 who

I 597. who by a heauy and mournfull silence shewed they had no pleasure therein. But see the 3. of September the death of Hernand Tiello slaine with a musket, at the defence of the raelin which his Maiesty caused to be assailed, afflicting them with a publike sorrowe, giues the Cittizens an assurance of a speedy deliury, and the assailants to conceiue a certaine hope of victory. There is no so great prosperity, but is crossed with some aduersity, and trouble. Two daies after, the Lord of Saint Luc, gouernor of Brouage and great Master of the Artillery of France, slaine in the trenches, obtained that graue and worthy testimonie of his valour from his Maiesties mouth, to haue lost that day a most valiant and faithfull seruant, leauing his people much grieved, and the whole campe lamenting this generall losse to France, as of one of the braue Captaines of his age.

S. Luc slaine

In the meane time the Cardinall approched, vaunting that he would fight within foure daies. Yet had hee no inclynation to put it in practise. The King to drawe him to battaile, preuents the policy which the enemy would vse to succour the place: he takes his place of battaile on the toppe of Long-pré a quarter of a league behind the inclosure of his campe, intrenched as well to saue themelues from the Cannon shot of the towne, as from theirs that came to succor them. And to keepe the enemy from sending in any succors on the other side of the riuier, he leaues the Lords of Montigny, La Noye, de Vieques and Cluseaux, there with three thousand foote and foure hundred horse.

The Cardinall approched.

The 15. of the sayd moneth, the towne beeing reduced to that Estate, as without succors it must needes yeeld of it selfe, the Cardinall in the morning castes two artificiall bridges vpon the riuier of Somme, where, through the fauour of his forces and Cannon hee passeth two thousand five hundred men, amongst which were eight hundred choise Captaines, to thrust themelues into the Towne, and about two of the clocke hee shewes himselfe in the viewes of Long-pré, with an order which in thewe did promise a generous attempt. But the diligence of his Maiesty, his courage without feare, and the wise order hee presently gaue at his arriual, changed their braue countenance into a cowardly and base feare. The King leaues three thousand men to gard the trenches against the sallies of the towne: hee presently marcheth with all his troupes to the place of battaile, and plants his Cannon to his best aduantage.

The artillery of the beseegeed and of them that came to succor them, thunders, but they passe ouer his Maiesties esquadrons. Our men during this seege haue beene well acquainted with the shot of the Cannon, but they stand firme like rockes. They tire the enemy with continuall skirmishes, the Cannon mightely annoy them, the admirable gouernment of the Leader, and the firme resolution of the assailants doth so terrefie them, as at the first attempt, they thinke of a retreat, and presently they retire to the quarter where the Kings light horse did lodge by the riuers side.

The foure aboue named Colonels hauing discovered the Cardinalls Stratageme, charged them that came to succor the towne, kill, take and force the whole bodie to repasse the riuier in disorder, and to abandon their bridges. The King seeing the enemy lodged amongst the riuier, passeth three Cannons ouer the water, shoots at them and doth annoy their lodging, and remayning all night on the place of battaile, abates the ioye which the beseegeed had shoven by the number of fires which they had made. So the Cardinall seeing all his attempts fruitlesse, in steede of turning head to the towne or against the French troupes, hee beginnes verie earlie in the morning to retyre and to take an other lodging on the mountaine of Vignancourt.

The Cardinall retires.

The King follows him with foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foote, lodgeth vpon the next hill and a great valley betwixt them, continues foure or five houres in battaile before their army, prouokes them by his Cannon and continuall skirmishes, viewes all their forces, number, forme and countenance, and seeing them them disposed to retire, determines to charge them in their lodging. But it is good some-times to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. Moreouer it was a great glorie for his Maiesty to haue shamefully chased him away, without rayfing the seege from so great a towne, and to haue pursued him with the Cannon three Leagues.

They take a contrary way, and couer the right wing of their army which lay next to the French, with their wagons chained together, they cause their horse to aduance into the head of the army in forme of a halfe moone, and their foote into battailions, diuided into foreward, battaile and rereward: they place their Cannon in the head of these esquadrons, in this sort they place their troupes, and their baggage in safety, making a shewe some-times as if they would charge. But seeing, that to come to the gates of the City beseegeed, they must force through the Kings army, which being in battaile did fight with their countenances and gesture, they haue no will to attempt this passage, and by their speedie retreat giue all France an assured hope to be soone freed from this strange nation which sought to ruine it.

The beseegeed are now forced to yeeld to the victors Lawe. This shamefull retreat hath ouerthrowne their first resolution. Their practises, inuentions, engines, their incredible labour to cast vp earth, their many Cannons, their deepe trenches, their continuall watching, nor the strength of the place, could not keepe the assailants from lodging vpon their rampar and raelin, & so nere as they came to handie blowes. So two daies after, the Marquis of Montenegro, who commanded in the towne after the death of Hernand doth promise to yeeld the place if within six daies he be not succored with two thousand horse that should enter into the towne.

So was it sayd and so done. The time inuited the Cardinall, and gaue him leysure, being with all his forces within seauen Leagues of the towne, but he had neyther will nor power to releue them. And therefore according to the capitulation made the 19. that the soldiars should depart with their armes, their matches light, their colours flying and drums founding, with their horse and baggage, and whatsoeuer they could carry-away of theirs, the five and twentieth of the moneth, his Maiesty hauing put his army in battaile, sent the Constable, the Marshall of Biron, the Duke of Montbazon and the Lord of Vieques to the port of Beauuois where the garrison should come forth, who comming to the gate, the bridge is let downe, and the Marquis comes forth on horse-backe alone, but followed by a hundred and thirty horse and as many Harguebuziers on foote for the gard of his person. They receiue him and conduct him to his Maiesty, who attended him halfe a League from the towne. The King was accompanied with his white Corner, wherein were about seauenteene hundred horse, and five hundred Suisses, hauing about him the Prince of Comy, the Dukes of Montpensier, Neuers and Nemours, the Prince of Joynville, twelue Marshalls of France, and other Noblemen in great numbers, mounted vpon a goodly courser with a rich cavarafon, and a sadle imbrodered with the ground of carnation, was wonderfull richly apparelled, and holding a royall Scepter in his hande, hee doth imbrace him most graciously, and then dismisseth him. Hee goes to horse, and by the Kings commandement the Constable conductes him two Leagues vnto the confines of the King of Spaines territories.

All the Spanish Captaines, and others both of horse and foote, passing by his Maie, flie, light from their horses and kisse his boote, with great humility and reuerence: and follow their Leaders being receiued by the king with amiable and curteous words. After the Marquis and his gard, followed about a thousand women of base quality, amongst the which some foure hundred of the towne marched willingly, a hundred and threescore wagons laden with all kind of baggage, and vpon them about three hundred men sicke of the plague and wounded, foureteene hundred shot, and sixe hundred corsiers well appointed, and in the end, ten companies of horse, sixe of men at armes Lanciers, and foure of Carabins, which made in all about five hundred horse.

The

1597 The King hauing by the most memorable attempt, and the greatest glory of arms, that might bee, pulled this strong Towne out off the strangers pawes, without the recovery whereof, we were in danger to be lost, and plunged in the gulfe of miserie, entred the same day into Amiens towards night, triumphant and victorious, and our owne Towne, recovered from the enemy, accompanied with a thousand Gentlemen on horseback, and receiued with a wonderfull ioy and applause of all the people, who lighted at our Ladies church, & caused solemne thanks to be giuen to God, for that twenty companies of foote, and three of horse in garrison, and gaue the garrison thereof to the Lord of Picques.

Doubtlesse oh Lord we haue reason herein to admire the wonders of thy might. The surpris of this place seemed late a Charybdis, to swallow vp the greatness of France. But it is not now alone, that the iudgements of God doe make vs knowe, that if he pul vs downe with one hand, he rayseth vs vp with the other: and if he be in the brinke of our destruction, he retires vs by the hand to saue vs. So his promise subuerted the desseignes of the Spaniard, who by this trophie promised to extend his conquests, and recouer those places and Prouinces which hee had lost. So from the trouble bred by the enemies of this estate, grew the aduancement of our quiet, from their pernicious practises, the assurance of the Countrey, and settling of inconstant mindes, from their vnjust attempts and violences: one of the greatest actions that hath beene of long time for the good of France, and preferuation of this Monarchie. The losse of Amiens was shamefull, but the recovery glorious: the taking strange, but the reduction admirable, at his enemies nose, and in view of his armie. Finally a reduction, which giues as much consolation as the inuasion brought desolation.

Forced into Artois.

The Cardinalls retreat puts the King in hope, that God would do him iustice, for the wrongs that hee and his had done vnto his realme: with this desseigne hee marcheth with his troupes, and eightene peeces of Canon, to Dourlans, into the which the Cardinall in passing had put some of the best men of his armie, with a great conuoy of victuals and munition of warre. Hee presents himselfe, and seekes by all meanes to draw them out of the precinct of their walles. But being loth to aduenture any thing, his Maiesie passeth into Artois, fillsthe Countrey with feare and terror, goes vnto the gates of Arras, into the which the Cardinall had shut himselfe, dischargeth fise and twenty or thirty vollees of Canon, makes a stand there: and by all the deuises which a generous and warlike minde may inuent, he seekes to draw him to fall forth, and to see some braue exploit of his men at armes.

returne.

In the end, his Maiesie (not able by any stratagem to heare these cold humours which did freeze their hearts through feare,) the rest of his victorious armie, alter to great toyle, endured in so long and painefull a siege, the raine and the sharpeesse of winter which approached, called him back to provide for a people, who by the negligence of their owne health, had lately as it were, enclosed within their walles the destinie of France, and so to passe into Brittaine, to finish that great worke, for the restoring of this Monarchie, that afterwards he might with all his forces, set vpon the common enemy of his Estate, if the negotiation of peace betwixt these two mighty warriours, practised by the Pope, a common father, did not take effect.

But before we proceed, let vs see the last acts of the Tragedie that was played in Sauoy. The discomforts of the lodging of Pont-Charra, caused the Kings armie to winter about Grenoble, and the extraordinary Snow stoppes the passages from Daulphiné into Sauoy. The Duke of Sauoy embraceth the time and occasion, to recouer the Countrey of Maurienne. Hee parts in February with twelue Canons, and by the induction of Albigny, camps before Aignevelle. At the first brute hereof, Les-Diguieres sent the Lord of Creguy, vnder the authority of Lieutenant generall for the King in Sauoy: hee causeth him to passe the rough and steepe mountaines on foote, where through the rigour of the season, appeared no traces of man on the side of Maurienne, to march more safely, accompanied onely with seuen or eight Gentlemen. Hee arriues happily at S. Iohn of Maurienne, findes that the Seigneur of Pasquiers comman-

A commanding in the sayd place, had fortified the approches of the bridges of Ameflex and Hermillon with good barricadoes, & finisheth them with speed. The sixt of March the Duke puts his Cannon in battery, and the next day Arce Capitaine of the sayd place, yeelds it vpon condition not to ioyne with Creguy but to returne towards Grenoble. They supposed this place would haue held at the least six weekes: and the Sa-noissen, to deceiue the Seigneur of Creguy, beeing lodged but three leagues from him, continues shooting his Cannon into the aire, to perswade him that the place was not yet yeelded. Creguy abused by this stratageme of Albigny, marcheth with a good troupe of foote, to take some lodging from the enemy, thinking that Ayguebelle did yet hold good. But God will haue man to knowe that he is man, and that his condition makes him subiect to the chances of this world. Hee findes the Duke before him, being lodged, the eight of the moneth, and thinking it some troupe gone forth to the warre, hee aduanceth neere, and with a furious charge seekes to open a way through the enemy. The whole army comes vpon him, and as hee thinks to recouer his barricadoes by the sides of the hills, as they gaue him hope, he findes the snowe had stoppt the passages, and finally compassed in on all sides, he is forced to take a Lawe from the stronger, and by his imprisonment to redeeme the liberty of Pasquiers, his Capitaines and souldiars. The Duke proceeds and taking all Maurienne, by composition, makes great desseins vpon the towne of Grenoble, by meanes of a fort which he had built to couer his Countrey on the side of Montmelian and Chambery.

prisoner.

The fort was vpon the frontier of Daulphiné, about a quarter of a League within the Kings Countrey towards Grenoble, vpon the side of a hill about the village of Burraux, kept by Bellegarde a gentleman of Sauoy, with seauen compaines of foote, and furnished with all munition necessary, but made rather by ostentation (hauing as a great wonder sent the plot thereof almost to all the Potentates of Christendome,) then by any necessity, the place lying neere to Montmelian the chiefe fortresse of Sauoy, from whence he might commodiously make his desseins vpon Grenoble.

Grenoble did wonderfully apprehend this eye-sore, and Les-Diguieres hauing dispersed the Kings army for to winter, framed many desseins and enterprises at Grenoble vpon this fort (the which for that it was made defensible the cue before Saint-Barthelemes day, the Duke called it by that name,) and had attempted it by seage, if hee had not beene pressed with the want of the chiefe sinewes of warre. In the ende vrged by his duty, and mooued by the misery, of his Maiesties subiects, and pressed with the iust intreaties of the chiefe officers, both of iustice, and of policy within the Countrey of Daulphiné, hee leagnes of many souldiars that came forth, the estate of the place with the forces that kept it, and sends often to vewe it in the night.

Fort of Saine Barthelemes.

Hee is informed that it may bee taken by escalade in two places, at a corner on the right hand going from Grenoble, and on that side which looks towards Iser, the earth being not yet about two sadome and a halfe high. He causeth the troupes neere to Grenoble to approach, makes them to passe ouer the bridge into the towne, and E fumes that all the rest shall make the same passage, to go into Maurienne where the army of Sauoy was. But the 14. of March on Palme-sunday eue, hee secretly puts some petards into a boate, and thirty Ladders, necessary for the execution, and at the same instant hee causeth his troupes to repasse in the night, in boates prepared to that ende, to take from them of the fort all knowledge that they were on their side, whereby they might haue occasion to call for supplies from Montmelian or Chambery.

Things thus disposed, hee parts from Grenoble the 25. of the sayd moneth, in the morning, ioynes at a village called Lombin with such as he had appointed for this execution, making about three hundred horse, and a thousand or 12. hundred foote, diuided into foure troupes, commanded by the Seigneurs of Morges, of Hercules Lieutenant to Les-Diguieres company of men at armes, of Auriac, and of Marnieu, enseigne to S. Julian: hee calls these commanders a part, acquaints them with this desseine, to set vpon the fort the night following, and arriues there about cleuen of the clocke at night.

1598. The Captaines appointed to plant the Petards and the Ladders, performe their charge with an incredible resolution, notwithstanding the alarum which those of the Forte had taken, by reason of the fires indiscreetly kindled by their boyes. The Petards work their effect happily, one at the false gate, which lookes towards Grenoble, and the other at the principall port towards Montmelian: the alarum growes horre on all side, so as they within the Forte knew not which side to garde. They mount to the scale, doe some ladders are ouerthrowne, and with their shot they seeke to repulse the assailants, who get vp and come to handy blowes: the weakest must yeeld to the stronger. The enemies sought to make a new head: but after some little resistance, they slae a hundred of them, and the rest leaped ouer the rampar where the alarum was least violent. Bellegarde and some others remained prisoners: of seuen Enseignes, five were sent vnto the King, the two others were lost in the heat of the assault. They found there six peeces of battery, and three for the field, with great store of powder, leade, match, and corne: which had beene so many scourges against the vniuersal usurpations of the Sauoisien, if the reduction of the Duke of Mercaur, and that which remained to conquer in Brittanie, had not layed their armes aside, and aduanced the treaties which were made for the tranquillity of their estates.

The Kings authority had for nine yeares beene banished out off such places as the Duke of Mercaur held in Brittanie: This Prouince was a prey for such as enriched themselves with the miserable spoiles thereof: the people hauing nothing left them but their voice, wished to see themselves freed from the tyranny of many vicious men, and without mercy, and to taste with many others, the effects of the Kings clemencie and bounty: and his Maiesty greened infinitely to see them afflicted, and not able to releue them, for the vrgent necessity of his affaires. But after a storme comes a sunne shine. The Duke of Mercaur had often giuen hope of his submission and obedience, but the places of his command, and the qualitie of his person, in his opinion deserued a voyage thither. Our Henry is not slouthfull in that which concernes the good of his realme, and the great loue he bare to the ease and health of his subiects, who with a generall voyce, giue him that fauourable title of Father of his people, & made them willingly to exceed the bounds of modesty.

At the onely brute of his coming, the Lords of Heurtault, and La Houssaye of S. Of-fange, commanding at Rocheport vpon Loire, knowing that the Duke of Mercaur was ready to free himselfe from the Spaniard, and to be reconciled to his Maiesty, they cast themselves at the Kings feete, beseeching him to receiue and accept of them as his most humble seruants and subiects, and that it would please him in that qualitie to continue them in the command of the sayd place: to appoint what garrison he pleased for the good of his seruice: to grant them a pardon for their taking of armes, and all other things which had followed, vnder the authoritie of the Dukes of Mayenne and Mercaur, whom they had acknowledged for the heads of the vnion: and with that capitulation they bring to the Kings obedience, the places of Saint Symphorian and Rocheport.

Plessis of Cosne at the same instant yeelded the Towne and Castle of Craon to his Maiesties seruice. But the surprise of Dinan by the n of S. Malo, one of the strongest places of Brittanie, in the which the sayd Duke put his greatest hope, forced him to flee to his Maiesties mercie. There is no cause so bad but may bee shadowed with some apparent reasons. The Duke of Mercaur giues his Maiesty to vnderstand, as well for himselfe, as for those that shall submit themselves vnder his Maiesties obedience, that the zeale of the Catholick religion, the respect of the good of the realme, whereof he had alwayes desired the preservation, and feared the dismembred, the danger into the which Brittanie was brought, when as the King encountered the Spanish violences vpon the frontier of Picardie, the intelligences of the greatest of the Prouince with the enemy, the meanes they had to make diuers enterprises, and to draw in forces to the great preiudice of the Crowne and State, had caused him to continue so long in armes after his Maiesties reconciliation with the Pope: and therefore hee beseecheth him

A hum most humbly to take knowledge of his good will, and to countenance and vse him as his most faithfull seruant and subiect.

His Maiesty had alwayes wished, that God would giue him the grace, to end the troubles of his realme: rather by a voluntary obedience of all his subiects, then by force and necessity of armes: that the last come might tast the same frutes, which his bounty shewed to those that had formerly returned to their obedience. So the sayde Duke of Mercaur, the Clergie, officers, Gentlemen, and other persons of all qualities and conditions, making their due submission, and taking the oath of fealty, were restored to their goods, offices, benefices, charges, dignities, immunities and priuileges. So our King about all the Princes of the earth, got this commendation, to haue excelled in wisdom, valour and clemency. The whole Prouince, not by a politike necessity, (which disposeth people to the obedience of their Soueraigne Princes) but as it were appoynted by God to commaund ouer them, acknowledged our Henry for their Soueraigne King, protested to liue and dye in the obedience which loyall and faithfull subiects owe vnto their supreme Lord. And by this milde reunion of the members with their head, of the parts with the whole, forgetting the bitterness of the forepassed warre, he dispersed the confusions and disorders, which threatened to bury him vnder the common ruines of these vniuersall troubles.

So in the ende, after so many labours, which Hercules could hardly haue surmounted, so many toyles, vnder which Atlas would haue shrunke, the ciuill war dispatched, the mindes of the French vnited, their affections mutually conioyned by a strict bond of loue, vnder the obedience of their King, and all the forces of the cheefe Kingdome of Christendome, were ready to fall vpon the common enemy of his Estate. But you haue fought inough: the blood of your subiects, oh Princes, hath beene too outrageously spilt in your Champion fields: the furies of your armes haue wonderfully amazed your subiects. Shewe your selues hereafter to bee pastors and fathers of nations, which reuerence the beauty of your Diadems. Let the seas, riuers and mountaines, which be as a barre betwixt the territories of your Dominions, limit hereafter the greatnesse of your desires. Heauen the Iudge of controuersies, doth pronounce that sweet and sacred name of Peace. A name which cannot displease any, but such as take delight in blood, spoyle, and fire: and (hauing nothing of a man but the name) breathing out nothing but impiety, licentiousnes & iniustice.

So after a long treaty betwixt the Deputes of both Kings, in the ende a peace was concluded at Vernins, as you may read in the following discourse.

The wisdom, iustice and piety of Pope Clement the 8. Three Popes in 17 moneths, Sixtus the 28. of August, 1590. Urban the 7. 27. of Septem. Innocent the 9. the 9. of December. Clement the 8. choisen the 30. of Iana, 1592. The Pope exhorts the two Kings to Peace.

the stormes which troubled both Land and Sea: he shewed himselfe a common father of Christians, a Mediator of Peace, and Vnion, at such a time as necessity and the estate of their affayres made them to desire rest. To this end he lets Henry the 4. King of France & of Nauarre, vnderstand by Alexander of Medicis, Cardinall of Florence, their his Legate in France, and doth aduertise Philip the 2. King of Spaine, by his Nuncio: that it was now time to lay aside all passions of hatred and reuenge, to resume peacefull spirits and to ioyne together against the common enemy of Christendome, who only made his profit of their ruines. That their subiects had bin sufficiently drunck with the Bloud, Gall, and Vinegar of Discord, and that it was requisite to refreshe them now with the sweete Wine of Peace.

These two Princes were too high minded, to demaund a Peace one of an other. There must be a third person, to vnite these two extreames. But there must be some one to make this entrance, and to be as it were an Interpreter of their intentions. To this end, the Pope makes choise of F. Bonauentur Calat-girone Generall of the Order of the Franciscans or Grey Fryars, to acquaint these two Kings with his holy & charitable perswasions vnto Peace. Religious men had bin actors in this War, they are now held necessary for the Peace. Spirits separated from the troubles and confusions of the world, are most fit for such negotiations, being lesse transported with violent passions.

Religious men should be Angels of Peace.

The King of Spaine did not attend to haue the Pope exhort him vnto peace. He had begun his reigne by War against the French, he would now end it by a Peace with the. He was now 70. yeares old, being desirous to discharge himselfe of the heauy burthen of so many Kingdomes, and to leaue them quiet to his sonne. To this ende, he must marry his Daughter Donna Isabella, who remayning in Spaine, without a husband, might contend for the succession of the Crowne, with Don Philip her brother. Hee could not giue her lesse for her dowry, then the Kingdome of Portugall, or the Lowe

Countries,

1598. Countries, with the County of Burgundy. By the one, he did weaken & diuide his Estates, & by the other, he gaue his daughter meanes to contend for her portio in Spain.
 For it was impossible to raigne long in Prouinces diuided by irreconcilable Warre, having two neighbouring enemies. And therefore to assure Spain, he must marry the Infanta: and to confirme that which hee gaue vnto her in marriage, it was necessary to conclude a Peace with the King of France, and to banish those vayne imaginations of the Conquest of an Estate, the which will alwayes growe great, by the encrease of Concord; and fortified with armes and inuincible forces, supports it selfe against any violence that shall seeke to supplant it. Being thus resolu-ed of a Peace, hee desires to vnderstand the opinion of his Councell. This resoluon to haue a Peace was iust; and all things shewed a necessity inseparable without it. The King of Spain (to whom this was well knowne) had no neede of any other Councell, for that his Councellors for the most part did hold, that his Estates could not continue in Peace, vnlesse that France were at Warre, and that they must alwayes mainteyne a diuision in that Estate, whose forces are so mighty and warlike. Yet would he haue it resolu'd on in Councell, in the presence of the Prince his Sonne, and the Infanta. The Prince transported with the courage of his great and high resolutions, had no other thoughts but to continue his fathers Conquests.

The Archduke applies all his minde to a Peace.

This conceit, that the Archduke, desired a Peace, did purchase him the loue of those people, ouer whom he should commaund in regard of his marriage; it con-firm'd him in the good liking of the King of Spain, seeing that he did apply himselfe wholly vnto his humour, and did wonderfully content the Infanta, who desired to be married with a beneficiall Peace. All Europe aspired to this generall good. Those which were farthest off, held it iust: the neighbours profitable, and such as were interested

1598. A interested, necessary: and this interest did not onely concerne the French and the Spanish, but all neighbour States, whome it did much import to see a Peace concluded.

The Archduke discouers the Kings disposition, by Monsieur de Sancerre, Agent at Brusselles for Queene Elizabeth Dowager of France. Vnto comming to Monceaux, presented the King with rich armes, which the Archduke had caused to bee made for him at Brusselles, and withall he gaue him charge to say vnto the King, that he lamented to see the continuance of a Warre so preiudiciall to two of the greatest Christian Princes, and so profitable to the common enemy of Christendome. That if it pleased him to hearken vnto a Peace, his will should be soone followed by the effect: offering all his vov'es and seruice to the King of Spain his Vncle, to make him resolute to a perfect and assured Peace, Wherewith Sancerre acquainted his Maiessty, after the deliuey of his Aimes, saying, That the Archduke was a Prince full of holy resolutions for the generall good of Christendome, who lamenting the affaires of Christian Princes, which went to ruine by their discord, had commanded him to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, if he would enter into any treaty of Peace, the onely and last support of Christendome.

 duke sends

The first entrance of a Peace.

The King receiued the present graciously, and hauing a while considered of the proposition (made vnto him by Sancerre) he answered. That he had neuer yet tasted the sweetnesse of Peace, desiring greatly to know what it was, not so much for his owne ease, as for the good of his Subiects: and although he had alwayes loued Warre, yet had he neuer refused Peace: That he was not insensible of the miseries of this diuision, and had often lamented so much blood vnprofitable spilt, and the weakning of the cheefest pillars of Christendome. That he had not entred into this Warre but for a iust and necessary defence, all Europe hauing scene the King of Spain to raise the greatest forces of the World, yea & his own Subiects against him, and that there was no VVarre more iust, then to recouer that, which was vniu'tly viurped. Yet notwithstanding, all these considerations should not hinder his inclinaon to a Peace. But he could not easily beleene, that the Archduke had any such defire, hauing so many Spaniards about him, who would neuer counsell him to make a Peace but in France.

This holy Resolution was imparted vnto the Archduke, and by him to the King of Spain, who doubted that a Prince borne and bred vp in armes, hardened in the exercise of VVarre, and prosperous in his proceedings, would giue any care to a Peace: and although the good of his Realme, might drawe him to this resolution, yet such as had counsell'd him to proclaime VVarre against him, when as his affaires were most desperate: euen when as foure or fiue Dukes his subiects were in armes against him, would not aduise him now to make a Peace, when as all France was reduced vnder his obedience. He therefore commands the Archduke to proceede warily and wisely, and not to do anything that might be dishonorable in seeking of a Peace.

The King of Spain desires
 of a Peace.

A long Peace preiudiciall to a warlike nation.

The Archduke knowing that the Kings inclination to a Peace (proceeding from his owne proper motion, and from the best aduice of his seruants who held a long Warre to be as ruinous for France, as a long Peace is hurtfull to a warlike nation) continued his first motion, sending backe Sancerre vnto the King who was then at Rouen, to speake more openlie and playnely vnto him, and to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, in what Towne vpon the frontiers the Deputies of cyther side might assemble.
 This negotiation was not managed by letters, but by instructions, and by one man only: which was kept so secret, as on the Kings part, no man was acquainted therewith but Villeroy the Oracle of the secrets of this Estate: neither would the Archduke trust any one but himselfe and the Duke of Sora, master of his horse, to the ende that Spain should not know any thing but what pleased him, when neede should require.

If matters had beene managed more openly, they might haue proued lesse succes-full. These Princes wanted not spirits of diuision about them which blamed this Peace.
 There were some in Spain which maynteyned that the lawes of Religion and Conscience, would not allow them to lay downe armes, vntill that all France were reduced vnder one Religion: and that it were dishonourable for so warlike a nation as Spaine, to demaund a Peace of them which had proclaimed Warre against them. In France some cried out that they should make no Peace with Spaine, without satisfaction on for Milan, Naples, Flanders, and Nauarre.

Those which did second this good worke with their graue and wise Councell, were men full of affection to the publike good, and capable of the remedies of this diuision. The President Richardot was the first to whom the Archduke imparted this secret and the King would haue Bellieure his chiefe Councillor of State acquainted therewith, vnto whom Sancerre imparted the order and state of the busines. This done, he returned to the Archduke to Brusselles, carrying with him a resolution of the Kings pleasure: wherevpon the Archduke commaunded him to conduct the Generall of the Fryars into France, being then come out off Spayne.

The Generall acquainted the King with the commandement he had receyued from the Pope, to passe into Spaine to dispose the Catholike King to a good and holy Peace, whereby the forces and wills of all Christians might be vnited against the common enemy, who made his profit of this miserable diuision: That the King of Spayne foreseeing it well, and lamenting this generall desolation, had said vnto him, that hee desired a Peace: which by his will should bee firme and durable, for the recovery of that which discord had caused the Christian Princes to loose, desiring not onely to treat a reconciliation of friendship betwixt the two Crowns, but also to preuent all occasions of future War: And to this ende, he had giuen all his power to the Archduke his Nephew, who was a Prince desirous of Peace.

The King answered: That he was desirous of a Peace, neither would he prescribe him any other conditions, then the honour & iustice of his pretensions, the which he held so assured, as no man might call them in question. The Generall of the Franciscans assured him, that the King of Spaine would giue him all the contentment hee could expect from a iust Prince. Reason which alwayes findes place in generous mindes, and necessity whose stings (when she is moued) are very violent, made these two Princes laye downe armes, to releue their Subiects, tired with miseries and publike oppressions.

These first hopes of a Peace, did but begin to appeare when as the King was aduertised of the surprize of Amiens. This was a frost which nipt all the hope of this first seed, a Winde which blew away all the flowers of this young Plant. The Generall of the Fryars returns into France, to assure the King, that if he pleased him, the taking of Amiens should not hinder the Peace. The King answered, that he held himselfe wronged in this proposition, that he neither could nor would hearken vnto it: & that he neuer did any thing by constraint: neyther were matters now fit for an accord. I will not (sayth he) that they demaund a Peace of mee in a brauery, I will neuer yeeld vnto it by force. We will talke more, when I haue recovered Amiens, Calais, and Ardes: and so hee sent backe the Generall of the Fryars, to the amazement of the enemy, who did admire the Kings noble resolution, which (like vnto the ancient Romains) was more admirable in Aduersity then Prosperity.

Amiens being recovered, and the Pope foreseeing by the continuance of the Kings victories, that it would produce no other effects, but a weakening of the whole body, he coniuers the two Kings anewe, by the apprehension of the publike miseries, and the pittifull estate of Christian affaires, to agree and to resume their chiefe inclinations to Peace: He commands his Legate to dispose them to some conference, whereby hee might discerne who was to be blamed, and who fayled in his affection, for the generall good of a Peace. The Legate goes to S. Quintin: the Generall of the Fryars comes thither vnto him, and beseecheth him, to be a meanes vnto the King, to send some man of credit, with whom they might confer of a treaty. The King sent the President Sillery, with an expresse commandement, not to consent to any treaty of a Peace, but vpon assurance to haue those Townes yeelded vp, which were held by the King of Spaine.

The proposition of Peace
continued.

A The Popes Legate, the President Sillery, and the Generall of the Fryars, met at S. Quintin: the greatest difficulty at this first entrance, was for the restitution of Places. The Generall of the Fryars sayd, that the King of Spaine would not purchase a Peace at so deare a rate. Sillery answered, that the King of Spaine did giue nothing of his owne, but did onely yeeld vp that which he could not keepe, the King hauing made prooffe by the recovery of Amiens, what he might expect of the other places. And if they desired a good and a durable Peace, they must make it iust: for else it could not continue. That there was nothing more iust, then restitution, nor more honourable then to leaue that willingly which they could not hold by force: That the King had expressely forbidden him, not to consent to any Treaty, nor to the choyse of any place for an Assembly, before he had assurance of this restitution: That hee held it a wrong done vnto the dignity of so great a Prince, to the honour of his commaundements, to the equity of his cause, and to his good fortune, once to hearken vnto the difficulties they made to yeelde him vp that which was his owne: That whosoeuer should treat with this preiudice, deserved to be punished as the authors of Treaties, that were dishonourable to their Masters.

The Generall of the Fryars (who could get no other resolutions at his hands) returned twise into Flanders, to let them vnderstand, that among all the reasons of the Treaty, that of Restitution was inuincible: and that it was in wayne to demaund a Peace of the French, if they did not restore all. That this Restitution was the soule of the Treaty, without the which it was a fantastike body, without any naturall proportion and substance: That in the ende, desiring too much, they should haue nothing: and thinking to hold all, they would loose all. The Archduke doth aduertise the King of Spaine, that there was no meanes to enter into the Temple of Peace, but by opening of the gates of Calais, Ardes, Dowrlans, and other places (taken in Warre) vnto the King of France. God inspired the heart of the King of Spaine, against the opinion of his Councell of State, to yeeld vp all his pretensions for the good of a Peace, rather then to leaue the world in this perpetuall Discord and Confusion. He did consult with his Councell of conscience, vpon the necessity of this Restitution. They answered him, that he could not liue with a quiet soule, nor die in the integrity of his Religion, if he did not restore those places. The King of Spaine followed this aduice, aduertising the Archduke, that he would not, for that which he had gotten from an other, loose the meanes to leaue a Peace to his owne Estates. Vpon this resolution, the Generall of the Fryars returns into France, and passeth his word vnto the Legate & Sillery, for the Restitution: so as after an infinite toyle of two moneths, these three made all things ready for a Treaty.

Sillery returns to the King, leading with him the Generall of the Fryars, as well to let him vnderstand from the Kings owne mouth, what he had sayd vnto him by his commaundement, as also to haue the Generall tell the King, what hee had promised, and propounded on the Archdukes behalfe. The Legate remayned at S. Quintin, as Gardien of the words and intentions of two Princes. Being assured of cythers faith, they agree vpon a place for the assembly of the Deputies, and to conclude the Treaty. The Towne of Veruins, (being vnder the Kings obedience, and nere vnto the frontiers of Artheis) was found the most commodious, and was presently furnished with all things necessary to receiue the Ambassadors. The King Deputed Pompe de Belieure Knight, Lord of Grignon, the chiefe and most auncient of his Priuy Councell, and Nicholas Brulart Knight, Lord of Sillery, Councillour of State to his Maiesty, and President in his Court of Parliamt. For the King of Spaine and the Archduke, there came John Richardot Knight, President of the Kings Priuy Councell; and of his Councell of State, John Baptista Taxis Knight, Commander of los Santos, of the Military order of S. James, and Councillor of State, and of the Councell of War: & Lewis Verrichen Knight, Audiercer & chiefe Secretary, & Treasorier of the Charters of the Councell of State. 1598. holy Sea, assisted by the Bishop of Mantoua, was as it were an Vmper of all difficulties A in this good and holy reconciliation. The Kings Deputies arrived first, and those of the King of Spaine presently after, where hauing saluted one another with hearts full of ioy and incredible content, they promised to treat Roundly, Sincerely, & Mildely, communicating their Commissions one vnto another, and reforming those errors which they found, that they might begin to treat more safely and freely. After much question and many protestations made by the Deputies of the King of Spaine for the Precedence, in the ende, they yeelded vnto the French Kings, to take what place they pleased, after the Legate, and the Popes Nuncio.

The Precedence yeelded to the French.

The Legate exhorts the Deputies,

At their first sitting, the Legate exhorts them to shewe the fidelity and integritie in this action which their Maisters desired, whereof he assured himselfe by their experiences, as of those which had happily managed the greatestt affayres of Europe, more then any other men: wishing them to consider, that hauing the honour to Councell two of the greatest Princes of the world, (who submitted their wills vnto their Councells, as the most diuine thing among men, when it is purged from ambitious passions, violent thoughts and preiudicate opinions) they should omit nothing that might regard the contentment of their good intentions, and not to doubt, but that God who hath an especial care of Kings and Kingdomes, would infuse the light of his spirit into their most seccet thoughts, and threaten them with the sincerity of his Iustice, if they did not apply all their indeauours to his glory and the good of the Christian common weale.

Then they entred into Treaty with a mildnesse fit for men of that quality and the merit of the matter. It was managed with such secrecie, as nothing was knowne before that all was concluded. The chiefe poynt of difficulty was, for the restitution of Places. Many reasons were propounded on eyther side: but the Kings Deputies had great aduantages: the force of reason, the prosperity of affayres in the recovery of Amiens, and aboue all the fauour of the time and occasion. The King of Spaine would not dye but in Peace: he desired his Sonne might raigne in Peace, and that his deerey beloued Daughter might be married in Peace. The Archduke languished with a desire to be married: and fearing least the promise which he had (not taking effect during the life of the King of Spaine) the conditions would be made worse, he pressed Riches and Taxes, not to proceed in this negotiation after the Spanissh manner, but to remember that they must not prolong their consultations, nor protract an action, the praise whereof depended vpon the conclusion. So after they had balanced all matters in the treaty, to reduce them to a iust proportion of reason, all controuersies betwixt the two Kings were reconciled and ended.

During the Treaty of Veruins, the Emperour Rodolphus the 2. as well for himselfe, as for some Princes of the Empire, at the instant request of the King of Spaine, sent Charles Nutzel of Honderpuizel, his Councillor in the Realme of Hongary, to the Estates of the vniued Prouinces, who had audiēce at the Haghe. His Ambassage was, to perswade the States to admit and heare certaine Ambassadors sent from the Emperour, and some Princes of the Empire, to finde a meanes for the propounding of a Peace, betwixt them and the King of Spaine: To whom the States made answer, that according to their first resolution, they desired not to enter into any conference of reconciliation with the Spaniard. That they had neuer refused any Ambassadors from his Imperiall Maiesty, beseeching him not to take the refusall which they now made in ill part, the which was not done through contempt, but rather to auoyde his indignation, which they might incur, if such and so statly Ambassadors returned not to his Imperiall Maiesty with a pleasing answer. Albert the Cardinall (to whome the Infanta of Spaine had beene long before promised in marriage, with a Donation of the Low Countries) by the commaundement and aduice of the King of Spaine, sent Don Francisco de Mendoza Marquis of Guadaleste, Admirall of Arragon, in Ambassage to the Emperour, to demande of him 6. poynts of great importance, for the surety and augmentation of the limits of his future Estate, and of the said Infanta.

The Admirall of Arragon sent Ambassador to the Emperour,

1. That

1598. A 1. That the Emperour should aduance the King of Spaine to the Lieutenantship or Viconty of Bezançon. 2. That he should declare himselfe openly against all such, as should hinder a Peace betwixt the state of the Lowe Countries. 3. That he should appoint a Governour and Councell in the Duchies of Cleues & Iuilliers. 4. That the sentence giuen against them of the Cittie of Aix, should presently bee put in execution, without any delay. 5. That he should provide some speedy remedy for the Hans townes, to restrain the insolency of the Englishmen. 6. That he will giue permission to leuie troupes of soldiers, in the territories of the Empire.

To the first Demaund, touching Bezançon, the Emperour (who desired to see the same as well of the Peace, which was treated at Veruins, as of his Brothers marriage, Albertus the Cardinall) answered, That he was not ignorant how much it did import the Townes vnder the King of Spaines obedience, lying neere vnto Bezançon, to haue the said Towne mainteyned in Peace, vnder the protection of the Empire. That for diuers and notable considerations he must confer with the Princes of the Empire, touching the said Vicarship. And to the ende it might be done with greater assurance and authority, he would perswade them to confirme it. In the meane time, he desired the King of Spaine, to take this delay in good part. This Viconty of Bezançon (which is an Imperial towne in Bourgundy) did belong vnto William of Nassau, the Prince of Orange deceased, whose goods the King of Spaine had confiscated as wel in the Franche Comte, as throughout all the Countries of his obedience. He therefore desired that the Emperour (making vse of this confiscate, against the said Prince and his heires) would transfer the Viconty of Bezançon on him. The Spaniard made this demand, that in proesse of time, he might by his Officers attaine to the knowledge of all the exchanges & other busines that passe at Bezançon for France, Germany, the Low countries & Italy, the which import much to be knowne, but aboue all to haue some footing in the Duchie of Bourgundy.

To the second Demaund, That his Imperiall Maiesty should declare himselfe openly against such as hindered the progresse of the Peace betwixt the States of the Lowe Countries. The Emperour did well vnderstand, that the King of Spaine did couertly accuse some Princes of the Empire, as if they had fauoured the warres of the Lowe Countries, especially by some words which the Admirall vsed vnto him: That it would please his Maiesty to make a difference betwixt the King and his Rebels, giuing the world to vnderstand by whom the Peace is hindered, punishing the Offenders according to the constitutions of the Empire. But the Admirall could not moue his Imperiall maiesty to stir vp new broyles among the Princes of the Empire vpon this cause, who answered, That till then he had giuen sufficient testimony of the loue he bare to the Peace of the Lowe countries: & when he hath heard the report of the Deputies, he will aduance it as far as his authority will permit him. Which Deputies were sent from the Emperour, and certaine Princes, as I haue formerly sayd.

To the third Demaund, That he would appoint a Governour and a Councell for the Duchies of Cleues and Iuilliers, His Imperiall Maiesty did answer: That he had resolved to send one or two thether, good Catholikes, to auoide a greater inconuenience. In the meane time the King of Spaine should be carefull to keepe good gard on his part, and assure himselfe of all necessary succours, the which notwithstanding must be done with discretion: to the end, that such as pretend any interest, haue no occasion of Icalousie: the which the Emperour himselfe is forced to intertaine by reason of the concurrence of the time. Whereunto the Admirall replied, That it was necessary also that his Imperiall Maiesty should commaund those Princes which pretended any right vnto the said Countries, that hereafter they attempt not any innouations, tending to the diminution of the Imperiall authority, or to the preiudice of his Catholike Maiesty: and that his Imperiall Maiesty should call home those Deputies which are at Dnyfeldorp, as Authors of badde practises, to the ende his Catholike Maiesty may not bee forced to vse other meanes. And although it were very conuenient to respect the Princes, yet must they not bee so carelesse as in curing the outward griefe, not to provide for all inward dangers. To whome the Emperour answered:

That

1598. That as for Cleues and Iuilliers, he would lend to the Princes pretending any right, A that they should not stirre, seeing it did belong onely to his Imperiall Maiesty to determine among them, hoping they would obey him. The cause of this demand was for that Iohn Duke of Cleues, of Iuilliers and of Bergh (who is yet in good health) was a widower and somewhat distempered in his braine, without children, & without hope to haue any, which bred a strange confusion in those Countries, which are ioyning to the Lowe Countries & Germany: The neighbour Princes were much troubled, and his Country was made very desolate vpon this pretext, during the yeares, 1598. and 1599. There were three sorts of Pretendants: and before he was dead, they seemed to play the Fable of the Beare. First the Duke of Prusse, and the two Brethren Dukes of Dex-Ponts, pretended by reason of their wiues, sisters to the said Duke Iohn of Cleues the 2. B The Emperour, who maintayned, that for want of lawfull heires Males the said Duchy, by right of the fee, should returne vnto the Emperour their soueraigne, being as fees masculine of the Empire. And Albert the Cardinall brother to the Emperour, who besides the donation which he expected from the Emperour his brother of his right, desired that during the life of Duke Iohn, a Catholike Gouvernour should be named, and at his appointment, that after his death he might vnto these Duchies lying neere vnto the Lowe Countries, the which he hoped should be given him in marriage and become Maister thereof. But all the enterprises which hee made, and all the ruines and spoyles which his army committed vnder his Lieutenant the Admirall, preuayled nothing, but his army was forced to retire, and to deliuer vp those places which C they had taken, vnto Duke Iohn, who at this present is married with the daughter of the Duke of Lorraine, as shall be said hereafter.

The fourth Demaund: That the sentence given against them of the Towne of Aix should be presently put in execution. It did much import the King of Spaine, and Albert the Cardinall, that the towne of Aix (lying in the Country of Iuilliers, nere vnto Lembourg) should bee at the Protestants deuotion. He therefore required the execution of the sentence given against them, in the Imperiall chamber: for the reestablishment of a Catholike Magistrate. According to this demaund, the Bishop of Lege was appointed by the Emperour, to execute the sayed sentence.

To the fift Demaund, That he provide a speedy remedy for the Hans Townes, to restrain D the insolency of English Pirats. The Spaniard made this demaund for the townes of the East Country, as Lubeck, Rostoch, Hambourg, Breme, Stede and others, which did trafficke with his subiects, and from whome he receiued great store of munition for the Warre. Vpon this pretext, the English ships did take and spoyle the Esterlinge. Wherevpon the Emperour, by an Imperiall decree, did forbid the English to trafficke in the Hans Townes. And the Queene of England did answer by proclamation, that it should be lawfull for her subiects to take all ships that should carry any munition of War vnto the Spaniard. By this answer we may see, that the Queene did not greatly feare the Emperours prohibitions: who answered vnto the said demaund of the Admirall: That hauing more ample complaints, he would provide, as his duty and the equity of the E cause doth require.

To the sixt Demaund, That he would suffer him to leuy men, in the territories of the Empire, his Imperiall Maiesty made answer, That the Catholike King should in no sort doubt of his good affection, for that during so many yeares space, he had suffered him to make the like leuies of men: The which was neuer graunted vnto his aduersaries, who notwithstanding haue leued some, but without his Maiesties priuilege. But for his Imperiall Maiesty to graunt such a thing vnto the King of Spaine, either by Letters patents, or by commission, it was not conuenient, for that they haue employment for many souldiars against the Turke, so as it was to be feared, the whole Empire would murmur eyer vnder hand his Imperiall Maiesty was cōtent to assist him all he could. And if the affaires of Hongary would permit, to satisfie him fully & openly. But the Admirall did presse him much to haue Letters patents with commission to leuiemen, notwithstanding the former reasons, or any other respect, seeing that the Emperour may leuy men in the Lowe Countries, to serue against the Turke, Wherevnto the Emperour answered, Answered: That he could not graunt the King of Spaine any Patent generall, or leaue 1598. to leaue as many regiments of Souldiars as he pleased: seeing it had not bene vsed in former times. But seeing that his Imperiall Maiesty was not of sufficient power, to beare the burthen of this Warre, without the assistance of the Princes of the Empire, there was no doubt, but at the first Campe, and at the first occasion, hee should bee charged and reproached therewith: so as the contributions, and support of those Princes, would sayle him. To conclude, the Emperour intreated the King of Spaine, as well in this regard, as in all other things, to rest assured of his loue and affection, and how welcome his Ambassador was vnto him. These were the demaunds the King of Spaine made vnto the Emperour. To what ende B they tended, will appeare by the actions of the sayde Admirall of Arragon, hauing entred the countries of Iuilliers and Cleues, with the King of Spaines army, as we shall shew in the ende of this yeare. 1598.

Whilest these things passed in Germany, the most Christian King was at Nantes: he pacified Brittaine, discharged the new Garrisons, and some Imposts: and placed for Gouvernour there, Cesar Monsieur his base sonne, now Duke of Vandosme, who was betrothed to the onely Daughter of the Duke of Mercantur. He then graunted the Edict of pacification to them of the reformed Religion within his realme, as wee shall shew hereafter.

A Peace being concluded at Vervins, betwixt the two Kings, there was nothing yet agreed vpon for the Duke of Sauoy. It seemed the King of Spaine had forgotten him, and that hee did not acknowledge him for his sonne-in-lawe. The French King helde him for neither kinsman nor friend, so long as hee should detain the Marquisate of Salusses. The Marquis of Lullins (who was there Agent for the Duke) assured the Deputies, that the Duke had no other intention, but to giue the King more contentment hereafter, then forepassed occasions would giue him meanes. Vpon this assurance, he entred into the Treaty, the which by his occasion was in a manner broken off, three dayes before the conclusion. For the King was resolu'd, not to thinke of any accord with the Duke, but by present effects: without deferring the satisfaction of that which was due vnto him. D It was not likely the King would conclude a peace with the Duke of Sauoy, with lesse honourable conditions, then hee had done with the King of Spaine, from whom he had recovered all his places. But the Pope (feearing that this Marquisate of Salusses, would proue an Atrina to fire all Italy) preuailed so with the King, as he preferred the publike good before his owne priuate interest, being content (for the finishing of this building of Peace) that the Dukes Interest, and his Right, should be put to compromise.

It was agreed, that the Pope should bee the onely Iudge of this discord, touching the restitution of the Marquisate of Salusses, and that within a yeare. So a Peace was concluded, & signed by the Deputies: but it was not published till a moneth after: E only a general suspension of armes was proclaimed. The King being at Rennes in Brittaine, came post to Tours, and so to Amiens, for the better execution of the Peace, which was comprehended in 37. Articles, the which Peter Mathew sets downe at large.

All which Articles conteyned in the Treaty: and all that had bene concluded, agreed, and passed by the said Deputies in their Maisters names, they promise shall be inuolably obserued and kept, and to cause them to ratifie them, and to deliuer one vnto an other authentike letters, signed and sealed, containing the whole Treaty, and that within one moneth after the date of those presents, in regard of the most Christian King, the Cardinall, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: & that the Cardinall should promise, to procure within three moneths after, the like letters of ratification from the F Catholike King, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: They should solemnly sweare vpon the Crosse, the holy Euangelist, the Cannon of the Masse, and by their Honours, in the presence of such as they should depute, to obserue and fulfill Religiously and Faithfully, all that was contrayned in the sayd Articles: and the like oath should answer.

The King of Spaine, who desired a peace at what rate soeuer, found no condition in this treaty of Vernins, that might dissuade him from ratifying it: although his Council held the restitution of Towns, so happily taken, and so hard to recover, dishonourable and preiudiciall. He prest to haue it sworn and executed, witnessing the contentment he receiued in his soule, for the good which Christiantome should receiue by the concord of these two Crownes. The Archduke, who did second his desire, sent Deputies to assist at the French Kings oath, the Duke of Ascot, the Cont Armburg, the Admirall of Arragon, and Lewis de Velasco, being followed by 400. Gentlemen, Spaniards, Italians, Bourguignons and Flemings. The Cont S. Paul, receiued them vpon the frontiers. The Constable feasted them at Amiens, and pacified some quarrells growne among them for place. The Marshall of Biron, with a great and goodly troupe of Noblemen and Gentlemen, appointed by the King, receiued them a quarter of a league without S. Denis gate, conducting them vnto their lodgings, which were prepared in S. Anthonys quarter. The next day they went vnto the Louure, with all their traine, in rich and stately equippage, to kisse the Kings hands: who receiued them graciously, giuing an attentiu care vnto the discourse which Richardot made vpon the merit of this action, the common profit and necessity of a peace, the which hee said was to be preferred before a iust warre, and all hope of prosperitie. The King answered, C That he had desired peace, not for that he was tired with the discomforts of war, but to giue all Christendome meane to breath: That his armes fell out of his hands, when as they represented vnto him the teares which fell from the Popes eyes, for their reconciliation which might greatly aduance the quiet of the Church of God: That he would neuer be blamed to be ill affected to the preservation of the Peace: as hee neuer wanted zeale, nor iustice to seeke it, hauing alwayes preferred it before the vndoubted assurance of all the good successe, which the happinesse of his armes, and the reason of his defence promised him: beleeuing the aduice of them which holde, that wee must neuer, for the hope of any fauourable successe, refuse a good peace, and ground the expectation of the euent, vpon the appeare of present D things.

the oath.

The most sollemne forme of a treaty is, the oath which binds them that treat. It was not sufficient, that the Princes had signed it, and engaged their faithfull promises to maintaine it: they would make the God of heauen the Iudge and witness of their intentions, engaging their faith in the handes of his iustice, for an assurance of their promises. And therefore the King did swear the obseruation of the Peace, in our Ladies Church at Paris, in the presence of the King of Spaines Ambassadors. The Archduke did swear it in the name of the King of Spaine, in the great Church at Brusselles, in the presence of the Marshall of Biron, Belieure and Brulart, Counsellers to the King and his Ambassadors. The Duke of Sauoy did also swear it at Chambery, in the presence of Gnadagnes, Lord of Boutheon, Knight of both Orders. The oath was ministred in this manner: Wee promise vpon our faith and honour, and in the word of a King, and swear vpon the Crosse, the holy Euangill, and the Canon of the Masse, for that which concernes vs: That wee will obserue and accomplish fully, really, and faithfully, and all euery point and article contayned in the treaty of Peace, reconciliation and amitie made, concluded and determined at Vernins, the second day of May last past, &c. and will cause all to be obserued, maintayned and kept inuolably on our part, without any breach, or suffering it to be broken, in any sort or manner whatsoeuer. In witnesse whereof wee haue signed these presents with our owne hands. &c.

The King would haue the sincerity of his intention knowne to all the world, and Paris a witness of the oath he should take, to obserue the peace as religiously, as hee had made warre iustly. The Ceremony was performed in our Ladies Church at Paris, with

A with great pompe, Monseigneur de Villeroy did read the articles of the Peace. The King did swear the obseruation thereof, signed the Act, and embraced the Ambassadors of the King of Spaine, wishing the King his Brother a long life, that he might long enjoy the fruites of this Peace. This Ceremonie was ended with great ioy & acclamations of the people. From thence the King went to dine at the Bishops Pallace, where he feasted the Ambassadors, the Duke Montpensier supplying the place of Lord Steward. The feast was royall and magnificent, and all things were answerable to so great a Ceremonie. That ancient custome of drinking to the health of Princes, which came from that of the Greekes, who offered to every one of their Gods a Glasie of Wine, & since hath bene vsed, to shew our deuoted affection to great personages, was not forgotten. B The King dranke wine to the health of the King of Spaine. This ioy was continued at night at the Louure, in dancing, and the daies following in feasting at diuers great mens houses, by the Kings command.

All this did not hinder the execution of the Treatie, neither did the Deputies forget the interest of private persons. The Spaniards intreated the King for the returne of some that were absent, especially for the Duke of Aumale. The King answered them, that if they restored vnto Antonio Perez his children and goods, hee would giue the Duke of Aumale contentment, whereby he should enjoy the fruites of the Peace. The Spaniards replied, that Perez, who was then out of Spaine, for matters concerning the Inquisition, might not bee equalled with the Duke of Aumale, who was absent but by reason of the troubles. Euery one was content, eyther with that which was done, or with that which reason did not allowe to be done.

After that the Ambassadors of Spaine had obtayned what they desired for the execution of the Peace, and admired the Kings houses, and the wonders of Paris, they returned with a remembrance of his Maiesties bountie, who gave them Jewels and Cupbords of Plate. There remained foure principall men as hostages, for assurance of the restitution of the Townes, as it was concluded by the Treatie. All should bee performed by the second of August: they began by the Townes of Picardie so faithfully, as the King (withour expecting the full satisfaction of the Treatie) sent D backe the hostages, relying onely vpon the word.

It was also concluded by the Treatie, that the Archduke (who had approued the Peace in the name of the King of Spaine,) should also swear the obseruation thereof in the same name, and in the presence of such as it should please the King to send. His Maiestie would not employ any other, then such as had serued him so worthily in the conclusion thereof, as Belieure and Brulart, two of the chiefe of his Council, and him whose valour in the recovery of Amiens had much aduanced the end of this warre. His honour was accompanied with an other, that was greater and more desirable vpon the chiefe of this Ambassage. The King doth neuer forget to recompence great and generous actions: hee would haue the Marshall Biron as well a present of his fauours, as of the loyalty of his seruice. And therefore he erected his Barony of Biron into a Duchie, and made him Peere of France. He was receiued in the Parliament, with a generall applause and testimonie of all the assistants, that these honours, although they were great, did not equal the greatnesse of his merits. He made a sollemne feast for this new dignity. The King went from Saint Germaine to honour him with his presence: witnessing that this was not the end nor period of the honours, wherewith he would reward the perseuerance of his seruices, and the constancie of his affection. At that time there was nothing in him that was lesse to be admired then imitation. Slander could not cause any corruption in a body inspired with the life of honour and valour (as flies breed not wormes but in dead bodies) and hee that had spoken ill of him, should haue gotten no credit. Hee had not yet receiued E that pestilent infection, which corrupted his blood, and deprived him of all iudgement. Reprehension had no power ouer him; but when as hee spake vnreuerently of the King. One of his friends was then the Oracle of his fortune, who told him plainly, that if hee did not forbear his licentious speech, he would repent it. What can they do, answered he? the other replied: that which you feare not. And pressing him 1598. him to speake more plainly, his friend (knowing that Princes are very apprehensie & A sensible. and that the offences which they dissemble most, they pardon least) said vnto him halfe in choller, and halfe in iest, that the King would cut off his head. This threate was so vnlikely, as he made a iest of it. The bad intentions which began to seize vpon his soule in this Ambassage of Flanders, haue verified the prediction. Nothing could make him vnhappy, but the excesse of his happines, which deprived him of al gouernment & modesty. If he had bin lesse fortunate, he had bin more wise. It was no strange thing, to make the sonne of the Marshall Biron, Marshall Biron. An ancient house might well be honored with the title of a Duchie. A great Captaine, who had so great a share in the restaura on of France, deserved the honor & title of a Peere: but this was to recourence him in the midst of his court, for all that he might expect at the end of his carrier.

The first seruice the Duke of Biron did after this new dignity, was the voiage of Flanders. He made his assembly at Peronne, from whence he went to lie at Cambray. In the mid way, the Earle of Sore, Lieutenant generall of that Country, met him, who after that he had saluted him with a long and respectiue discourse, told him, that he had commandement from his maister to do him seruice in that voiage, and to accompany him vnto Bruxelles. They of Cambray feasted him in their Towne house. He had the like entertainment at Valenciennes and at Mons: Being arrived at our Lady of Halle, three leagues from Bruxelles, he found a Steward of the Archdukes, and fifty of his gard to attend him. The next day (which was the fift after his departure) he was met vpon the way to Bruxelles, by the Earle of Mansfield, the Duke of Aumale, and the Prince of Orange, with about two hundred horse, in the Archdukes name, & so conducted through the City vnto his lodging. He rested the Friday, and the next day he went to haue audience of the Archduke. He was accompanied with Count Mansfield, Belieure with the Duke D'aumale, and Brulart with the Prince of Orange. Thus they entred into the Archdukes chamber, whom they found alone, without any one but the Bishop of Antwerp, and the President Richardot. The Duke of Biron began the discourse, and Belieure continued it. On the Sunday following, the Duke of Biron went to the Cathedrall Church, the Archduke hauing sent him 20. Carosses for himselfe and his traine: There did the Archduke solemnly sweare the obseruation of the Peace in the name of the King of Spaine: from thence the Duke of Biron went on horseback to the Archdukes Pallace, where he dined. At the Archdukes table sat the Duke of Biron, Belieure, Brulart, the Count Mansfield, the Duke of Aumale, the Prince of Orange, & the Bishop of Antwerp. At another Table were some 20. French Gentlemen, chosen by the Duke of Biron, and 8. or 10. Spaniards & Wallons. So after some daies spent in feasting, the Archduke hauing presented the Duke of Biron with 2. faire Horfes, gold plate, a rich Jewell, and a Rapier, with Girdle and Hangers set with pretious Stones, all which were esteemed at ten thousand Crownes, hauing also giuen to Belieure and Brulart rich futes of Tapistry, and Chaines of gold, and to every one of the French Gentlemen, a Rapier blade, and a paire of Spanish Gloves, they returned home very well satisfied. But the Duke of Biron did not to much respect what was giuen him, as the esteeme they made of his valour, if he would imploy it for the King of Spaines seruice. Prote did first infect him with this poison, which caused a Feuer, & proued incurable, (but by that shamfull letting of blood) wherof the King was presently aduertised by a true hearted Frenchman, who remained at that time in the Archdukes Court. The Duke of Sauoy, who enioyed the same benefit of the Peace, was bound to the obseruation thereof by the like forme.

Mr. de Ruffieu a French Gentleman, who used the King of the Duke of Biron to the Duke of Biron.

The Duke of Sauoy swears the peace.

The King sent to M^r de la Guiche Gouvernour of Lion, that hee would willingly haue giuen him that charge, but that he feared his absence might somewhat prejudice the good of his affaires, and his indisposition not suffer him to performe the voyage. Hee therefore commanded Guadagnes Seneſhall of Lion, and Knight of both orders, to vndertake this charge. The oth was taken in the Friars Church of Chambery, on Sunday the second of August, where the Duke was assisted with all his Knights of the Armande, and to witnesse the content which hee had of this peace and reconciliation with his Maieſty, he sayd vnto Guadagnes, that hee held this day the happiest of all the daies of his life, and that all which remayned should bee to maintayne and honour the memory

A memory thereof. That it were not onely an indiscretion, but a blindness and a madness for him to change the felicities of Peace, for the miseries of Warre. The Duke gaue vnto Guadagnes, & to the chiefe gentlemen of his trayne, Jewells. Horſes Chaines of gold, and to all so many good words as there was not any one but did wishe him more profit by this Peace then he reaped. He refused not any thing that was demanded of him in the execution of the treaty, for the deliuey and ransom of prisoners, but onely the liberty of the Admirall Chastillons wife. Hee made answer to the Instance which Guadagnes made in the Kings name. That the respect hee bare vnto his Maieſties commandement, was so great, as to please him hee would restore her goods, and giue her some more liberty, whilst that hee might giue his Maieſty to vnderstand B the iust causes of her restraint.

In the Countie of Autrem wife to the Admirall, was Prisoner at Torres and there died.

That whatsoever had beene decreed at Rome, for her absolution, was rather in fauour of his Maieſty, then for any reason, for that hee was seized vpon bookes and writings that were execrable and damnable. The afflictions of this Lady did moue the hearts of the chiefe Officers of this Crown, & of many great Noblemen of the realme, her kinsmen and allies. The King had commiseration of her: for her misfortunes, her imprisonment, losses and disgraces deserved pitty. She was so transported with the good successe of the Kings affaires, that although shee were among her enemies, yet the fire of her desires could neyther be smothered vnder the ashes of affliction, nor vnder the fume of dissimulation. If she could haue done that wherof they accused her,

The Constable, the Cardinal of Lorraine, the Duke of Lorraine, and M^r Daniel lot intreated the Legate to do her iustice.

C she would haue made as soden alterations on the earth, as Henry King of Sueden did in the aire, and as admirable: as her will was absolute to desire that the King might overcome his enemies, and haue satisfaction for Nice and Salusies. Vpon the hope that this Peace should giue her some content, and that the Kings commendation by his Ambassador should giue sometrue to her miseries, shee writ a letter of the pittifull course of her misfortunes, wherby appeared the excellency of her spirit, in these words. Although (saith shee) the comparison bee as different as an Elephant and a Gnat, yet are they both vegetatiue and sensitiue creatures. My fortune, and that of my house, hath alwaies followed that of France and the Kings: for as since his marriage, I haue alwaies seene my Estate declyning, euen vnto the period of a totall ruine, by the ill

The Countesse of Autrem wrote a letter to Peter Martinez.

D successe of his affaires: so now when as God hath powred his blessings vpon him, that hee hath reuenged him of his enemies, euen by his enemies, & that against the conspiracies of the wicked, & the iudgement of the good, hee doth enioy his Inheritance, I will hope there shalbe some change in my condition. I desire it may be good: but if it proue otherwise, I will not alter my resolution, to receiue both good and euill as from the hand of God. I haue this aduantage ouer fortune, that hereafter her iniuries how violent and soden soeuer, shall not be strange vnto me. I am inured to my afflictions, as a Galley slave to his oare. Necessity teacheth me to suffer constantly, and custom makes my suffrance easie. The King also gaue Guadagnes charge, to let the Duke vnderstand, that hee had receiued three severall complaints from the City of Genoua, Custom makes afflictions easie.

E how that his troupes which he entertained thereabouts, vsed insupportable hostilities, tooke prisoners, chopt and changed them, & that his Maieſty desired the Towne might reape the fruit and safety which the common good of the peace did promise them, and that the Dukes troupes might be retired, to the end all Icalousie and distrust might cease. The Duke would not answer herevnto by writing, least (saith he) he should preiudice the pretensions which he had to that Towne, for about foure hundred yeares: saying only that hee did not thinke it had beene comprised in the treaty of peace, for that all other Townes and Prouinces had beene particularly named, and not that of Genoua. That hee could not free his neighbors from feare and distrust, but in retraying his troupes that were about the towne, to refresh them in Lombardie, hee should take away the cause, hauing no intention to prefer War before the happines of Peace. He therefore commanded Don Juan de Mendoza a Spaniard, to draw his Regiment, which consisted of twelue hundred men, out of the territories of Genoua, & to passe to Milan.

Complaints from the Towne of Genoua.

The Dukes pretensions.

The King of Spaine finding himselfe decrease daily, both in strength and health, desiring to finish that which he had resolved for the marriage of his eldest Daughter, 1598. Madam Isabelle, with Albert the Archduke his Nephew, although he were aduanced to a great Ecclesiasticall dignities, especially to the rich Archbishoprick of Toledo: he called before him in the City of Madrid the 6. of May, Prince Philip his onely sonne, being about 20. yeares old (whom he had also promised in marriage to Madam Mary, daughter to the Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, but she died soone after) accompanied with Don Gomes d' Auila, Marquis de Vellada, Gouverneur and Lord Steward of Prince Philip house: Dō Christophor de Mora, Earle of Castel Roderigo, great Comander of the Alcantara, Don Iuan d' Idiague, great Comander of Leon, all 3. being Councillors of State, & M. Nicholas Damant Knight, Coucellor, President, & Chancellor of Brabant, with Lalo Secretary for the affaires of the Low Countries, & no more: whereas the King made a Grant of the Low Countries to his Daughter, the which was read, signed, sealed, and written in the French tongue. By this match, he did institute these two future spouses, & their heires, males or females, Soueraigne Lords of all the Prouinces of the Low Countries, of the France-Conte de Bourgundie, & of the County of Charolois, vpon condition that the said Countries should returne vnto the King of Spaine, if they had no children of the said marriage. 2. That the Princeesse of the Low Countries which should be, were it either maide, or widow, should be bound to marry with the King of Spaine, or the Prince his Sonne, hauing obtained a lawfull dispensation from his Holinesse. Or if that might not be, (the Princeesse wanting will or power to accomplish this marriage) then should it not be lawfull for her to take any other husband, but with the content of the Kings of Spaine. 3. That it should not be lawfull for the Infanta, nor any other, called to the said succession, to ingage nor alienate any part of the said Countreies, without the consent of the heires & successors of the King of Spaine. 4. That they, their successors, nor subiects, might not in any sort traffick to the East & West Indies, vpon paine of confiscation. 5. That the Archduke should enioy the said Countries during his life, if he suruiued the Infanta: and if he had children, they should haue portions assigned, to maintaine them honorably: and to the eldest, were it sonne or daughter, should be giuen the Duchie of Luxembourg, in the County of Chemy, with the dependances, who after the Archdukes decease should enter into the possession of the said Countries. The chiefe condition was, for the maintenance of the Catholike, Apostolick and Romish Religion in the said Countries. And in case of contrauention (especially for the Navigation and Religion) the future Spouses, and their descendants should forfait all their interest to the said Countries. The last of the conditions was, that the Donataries should bee bound to pay all the debts and obligations contracted by the Emperour Charles the 5. & the King of Spaine, vpon the Parimony & reuenues of the Low Countries. The Patent of this donation was sealed at Madrid the 6. of May, 1598.

The Prince ratifies the donation.

The Infantaes acceptation.

Procuration from the Infanta to the Archduke, to take possession of the Low Countries, the last of June 1598.

The Prince of Spaine, to ratifie the said donation, declared his consent by other letters Patents, seeing it was the good will and pleasure of the King his Father, hoping it should redound to the good of all Christendome, and to the content of his good sister Isabella Clara Eugenia. And it is said, that for a greater approbation, he did swear vpon the holy Euangelist, neuer to oppose himselfe against it: setting his hand and seale to the said declaration, in the presence of the aboue named witnesses. The Infanta Isabelle did in like sort by her letters patents accept of the said Donation and Grant of the said Low Countries, & withall she shews how much she doth esteeme the gift, & that her intention was to keepe all the conditions annexed to the said donation, taking the like oath vpon the holy Euangelist, signing and sealing it as the Prince had done.

This being performed, and that the Archdukes Mother, who was also Aunt vnto the Infanta, had kissed her as her Daughter in law, they resolved to aduertise the Archduke, & that to that end she should write vnto him as a wife vnto her husband. And in this quality she declares her selfe Lady of the Low Countries in generall, Duchesse of Bourgundie, Lotiers, Brabant, Lembourg, Luxembourg & Guelldres, Countesse of Flanders, Artois & Bourgundie, Palatine of Hainault, Holland & Zeland, of Namur and of Zutphen, Marquis of the holy Empire, Lady of Frize, of Salins & Malines, of the Towne of Vtrecht, of Transillanie and Groninghe, & for that (desiring to obey the King her father) she had accepted of the said Seigneuries, she sent a full and ample procuration vnto Albert the Arch-

A Archduke her future Spouse, to take possession of all the sayd Seigneuries in the name of the sayd Infanta, giuing him full authoritie in the name of a Prince, and vpon her reputation, to make a generall assemblie of the Estates of the sayd Prouinces, for the effecting of her intention, promising not to contradict it, neither directly nor indirectly in any sort whatsoeuer.

The Estates of the Low Countries were assembled at Bruxelles the 15. of August, for the publication of the sayd Donation, where were many disputes about the receiving of the said Infanta by a deputie, and to sweare vnto her, considering the Priuileges of the Country especially of the Duchie of Brabant, which doth not receiue any Prince, but in their owne persons. But in the end, the said Cardmall Archduke was received in the name of the said Lady, by vertue of his procuration. Hee swearing to oblerue all the Rights, Priuileges, Liberties, Immunities and Customes of those Countries: and the Estates did sweare all fidelitie and obedience vnto her.

This done, the sayd Cardmall Archduke, being sufficiently knowne and accepted for their future Prince, according to the promises of marriage betwixt him and the Infanta: to enter into the consumation thereof, and according to the Popes grant, he went to Halle, a little Towne in Brabant, three leagues from Bruxelles, commonly called, Our Lady of Halle, a place of pilgrimage very famous: where he left his Cardinals Hat & habit vpon the high Altar. Then he began to giue order for his voiage, and the government of the Low Countries: where during his absence, hee named his Cousin Andrew Cardinall of Austria, sonne to Ferdinand the Archduke, who was brother to Maximilian the Emperour, and with him the Councell of State, appointing Francisco de Mendoza, Admirall of Aragon, Capitaine generall of his Armie, and Herman Earle of Berghe, Marshall of the Campe, with other Commanders and Officers, to put in execution that which had beene resolved vpon at Bruxelles, touching the frontiers of Germanie.

There were deputed to accompanie the Archduke, Philip of Nassau Prince of Orange, &c. the Earles of Barlamont and of Sores, Noblemen of the Country, with many Ladies and Gentlewomen, among the rest, the Countesse of Mansfield, Widow to the Earle, and Dowager to the Earles of Hemin and Hoochstrate, with many other young Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Low Countries, being desirous to see Spaine, and the triumphes and magnificence of the Prince of Spaine, and of the sayd Archduke and Infanta. All things being thus prepared, the Archduke parted from Bruxelles about the midst of September, taking his way (as he said) towards Prague, to see the Emperour his Brother, to confere with him touching the affaires of the Low Countries, and so to passe to Grets or Grazzen, to fetch the Lady Marguerite, Daughter to Ferdinand the Archduke of Austria, who was brother to the Emperour Maximilian the 2. being fianced or made sure vnto Prince Philip of Spaine. The Archduke should conduct her into Spaine, to consumate her marriage with the sayd Prince, and he his with the Infanta, both at once: the which he did, as we shall see hereafter.

E The Archduke before his departure, had written letters of the 18. of August, vnto the generall Estates of the vnited Prouinces, giuing them to vnderstand, that he went to marry with the Infanta, with whom he should haue the Low Countries in dowrie, being already received by most part of the Prouinces for their Lord & Prince. That he desired nothing more, then to plant a good peace in the Low Countries. And being now apparent, that the King was resolved to diuide the said Countries from Spaine, & thereby to take away all causes of ielousie and distrust: he desired the States to call to minde, that warre must once haue an end: and therefore they should conforme themselves with the Est of Brabant & Flanders, and giue care vnto a generall peace, & to receiue and acknowledge him for their Prince & Lord: for the effecting whereof he had giuen authority to the generall Estates of his Prouinces, whereof he expected their answers.

F There were Letters also from the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Arshot, the Marquis of Hauvre, to Count Maurice, of the like tenor: perswading him to be the iustrument of a good peace, and to set before his eyes the honour of his house, wherevnto he could neuer

A Diet at Ratisbon.

The Emperour seeing the Estate of the Empire in danger, appointed a Diet at Ra-tisbon, sending his brother the Arch- duke Mathias thither, accompanied with a number of graue and wise men. Hee propounded the iust complaint of the Emperour Majesty, for the great expences he was to make against the enemies of Christendome: That their attempts were not lesse, and their threats increased dayly, continuing their barbarous cruelty, so as he had no more means to make head against him, much lesse to giue him battaile. That the Estates of the Empire should remember the miseries of Hungary during the raigne of Mathias, vnder whom it was lost, and that they should prouide, least the like calamities should chance for want of succors: by means whereof, in steed of the holy Christian faith, the Turke would settle his cruell and barbarous superstitions. And that in these following yeares, the Estates should furnish him with twelue thousand foote and 4000. Horse: that if the worst should chance, the Empire might haue means to mainteine it selfe, if they lost a victory, or to march on with their forces, if they did winne it. Martin Bishop of Segobia, did likewise make great complaints for the Countreies of Stiria, Carinthia and Carniola, for the which hee demanded present succors.

the Emperours

Toune of Aix.

The Estates of the Empire hauing consulted some daies, decreed, to giue succors vnto the Stirians and to the other people that bordered vpon the Turke, onely for the C space of two monethes. And for the rest they resolved to giue the Emperour the supply of money which he required. Those of Aix la Chapelle had bene in mutiny some yeares before, and had expelled the Catholike Magistrate, and changed the whole Estate of the Common-weale: by reason whereof, at the instance of the King of Spaine, by his Ambassador the Admiral of Arragon to the Emperour, importuning him much to haue it reduced to the former Estate, lying so neere vnto his Countreies, the Em-perour had made a proclamation against them, with an interdiction of all succors: commanding the Arch-bishop of Treues and the Duke of Juliers to force those re-bells by armes, and to reduce them to their obedience. The Inhabitants being amazed, seeing also Albert the Arch- duke to enter into their Countrie with his troups, D and garrison of Lembourg: they resolved to submit themselves, by the means of some Senators, intreating the Arch-bishop of Cologne by their deputies to mediate their Peace, the which was granted them, expelling the Ministers of the Confession of Ausbourg, and others of the reformed religion. The which was executed, & the Catholike Magistrate restored as before. About this time the most Christian King sent backe the Lord of Buzenall into Holland to the States, to continue his charge of Ambassador. He assured them, that as farre as his Master might (preseruing the Peace) hee would haue them, promising to repay them the money wherewith they had assisted his Majesty during the warres. Some yeares before the Christians had receiued a sore blow by the losse of Iuanin, which the Turke had taken, euen by the disloyaltie of some Christians which had betrayed it. This yeare that wound was eased and almost cured, by the recovery of the sayd Iuanin, the which was surprisid in the night by a valiant Captaine called Adolph Schwartzbourg, accompanied with the Barons of Palsi and Nadsitz & two Frenchmen, one being the Seigneur of Vauvancour, & the other called Cassine, who had the charge of the Petards, with the which they forced a Port. They slue the Sargis of Iuanin, & a great number of Turkes. Many of them, especially women, cast themselves into the Riuier, & so perished. There were 300. Janissaries which sh it themselves into a Tower, in the which was Powder, which they set on fire, and so died.
There happened a strange accident in the Realme of Naples: a certaine woman transported with lust, poisoned her husband, called Appian de Boisy, Chancellor of the realme, F a graue, learned & reuerend old man, abandoning her selfe to one called Taleisy, an idle person & of no quality & for that she might continue it with more impunity, she poisoned her father Alexander Doringel, a worthy knight in his Countrey, for that he would not two Sons. And in the end being miserably married to this man, she grew zealous, and growing bitter one against another in words, they accused one another for their murders, so as they were iustly condemned and executed.

The King of Spaines sickness beginning in Madril (before the resignation which hee The King and made of the Low Countreies, to his daughter Isabella) increased daily, so as about the Kingdome feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, finding his strength to decay, and sometimes afflicted with a feuer, by the torment of a gout in his hands: as he had alwaies had a great deuotion to his Church of Saint Laurence, and a great delight in his Count of Escorial, which hee had built (the which is one of the richest, and most sumptuous buildings in Christen-B dome) he would needs bee carried thither, although the Physicians did dissuade him, being so full of paine: yet hee was remooued thither in fixe dayes, being about seuen Leagues from Madril. Being there, his gout increased his paine with a feuer, so as being out of hope to recouer, hee began to prepare himselfe for death, and recei-ued the holy Sacrament. Then he desired to haue D. Garcia of Loiola solemnly confessed the Archbishop of Toledo by the Popes Legat, by the resignation which Albert the Archduke of Austria had made vnto him. Afterwards hee had an Apostleme in his leg, and foure more vpon his brest, whereat his ordinary Physicians were much amazed, calling Olias a Physician from Madril. All these together with the iudice of Ver-gas an other practitioner, applied plasters to ripen these Apostles: being ripe, and C broken, they cast forth much filth, and a great number of Lice, so as they could hardly dresse him, being also so weake, as foure men were faine to remoue him in a sheet, to make his bed, and to keepe him cleane.

These lice, as the Physicians sayd, did ingender of this putrified stinking matter. In the beginning of September, as his feuer began to increase, hee called for the Prince his Sonne, and the Princeesse his daughter, the Archbishop of Toledo and others assisting, and shewing his bodie to his sonne, he sayd, Behold Prince, what the greatnes of this world is. See this miserable bodie, whereas all humane helpe is vaine. He caused his collin, being of brasie, to bee brought, and a deaths head to bee set vpon a cubbord, with a Crowne of gold by it. Then hee Commanded Don Lewis de Felisco, one of his D Chamberlaines, to fetch a little Casket, in the which hee had put a precious Jewell, the which hee gaue vnto his daughter in the presence of the Prince, saying. This Jewell was your mothers, keepe it in remembrance of her. Hee also drew forth a written paper, which hee gaue vnto the Prince, saying, That it was an instruction how hee should gouerne his Kingdome and Countrie. Then hee tooke forth a whip, at the end whereof appeared some markes of blood, saying, lifting it vp, That it was blood of his blood although it were not his owne blood, but the Emperour his fathers, who was accustomed to chastise his bodie with this whippe, and therefore hee had kept it, and shewed it vnto them. This done, hee disposed particularly of the order and pompe of his funerals. Then in the presence of the Popes Nuncio, he recommended the holy E Sea, the Pope, and the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish religion, vnto his children, desiring the Nuncio to giue him absolution of his finnes, and to blesse his children, recomending the Infanta his daughter, vnto the Prince his sonne, and to mainteine her Countreies in peace, appointing good Gouvernours, rewarding the good, and punishing the bad. Then he commanded, they should let the Marquis of Montclair at libertie, vpon condition hee should come no more to Court: and that the wife of Antonio (Perez sometimes his Secretarie) should bee freed from prison, vpon condition that she should retire herselfe into some Monasterie. Then he commanded them to leaue his Sonne alone with him, to whome hee said these words: My Son, I desire you should be present at this last act, to the end you should not liue in ignorance, as I haue done, how they giue this Sacrament of the last unction, and that you may see F the end of Kings, and of their Crownes and Scepters. Death is readie to take my Crowne from my head to set it vpon yours. Herein I recommend two things vnto you, the one is, that you continue obedient to the Church, the other is, that you administer Iustice to your subjects.

1598. The time will come when this Crowne shall fall from your head, as it doth now from mine: you are yong, I haue bene so. My dayes were numbred and are ended. God keeps an account of yours, and they shall likewise end. They say, that he did with passion inioyne him to make ware against Heretikes, and to retaine peace with France.

The Prince (thinking there was no more hope of life in him, and desiring to aduance the Marquis of Denia his fauorite) demanded the golden key of the Cabirer from D. Christopher de Mora; the which he refused, desiring his Highnes to pardon him, for that he might not deliuer it without the Kings expresse commaundement: where- with the Prince went away discontented. D. Christopher complained hereof to the King, who neither liked of the Princes demaund, being made too haſtillie, nor allowed of his refusall, commaunding him to carrie the key vnto the Prince, and to craue pardon. The Prince returning to visit his father, D. Christopher de Mora kneeling downe, kissed the key, and deliuered it vnto him: the which the Prince tooke, and gaue to the Marquis of Denia. And as the Prince, and the Infanta his sister, stood before the Kings bed, he sayd vnto them, I recommend vnto you Don Christopher de Mora, the best seruuant I euer had, with all my other seruants. And to giuing them his last farwell, and imbracing them, his speech failed him, continuing in that estate two dayes vntill his death.

He was borne in the yeare 1526. on Saint Markes day in Aprill, and died the yeare 1598. the 13. of September. He was but little of stature, but otherwise, of a pleasing aspect: yet he had no beautifull countenance, by reason of his great nether lippe, the which is hereditarie to the house of Austria: else hee was faire of complexion, rather resembling a Fleming then a Spaniard. of such a constitution of bodie, as hee was neuer sicke in all his life, but of the disease whereof he died, and was sometimes troubled with faintings. He did neuer eate any fish. He was of a constant resolution, and of a high spirit, apprehending presently the ends of things, and foreseeing them with an admirable wisdom and iudgement. Hee was neuer amazed for any accident. At his first comming into Flanders, by the grant of the Emperour Charles the 5. his father hee wooon two great battailes against the French, that of Saint Laurence at Saint Quintin, and afterwards that of Grauelines: and both by his Lieutenants, being himselfe of no warlike disposition. He was very deuout in his religion, and had opposed himselfe againt all called heretikes of his time, taking this occasion (as many haue written) to aduance his affaires in Christendome. Hee was unfortunate in his first marriage with Mary Princeſſe of Portugal, by whome he had one sonne called Charles, whose life was short & miserable, hauing a violent end vpon certaine imputations, which were layd vnto him, to haue had intelligence with Chastillon Admirall of France, and with William of Nassau Prince of Orange, touching the Low Countries.

This (as some say) was discovered by Don Iohn his vnclie, bastard brother vnto the King, who being inexorable against them that had offended, came vnto the Princes chamber in the night, whereas hee found two pistols behind his beds head, and some papers which did auerre the intelligences he had with his enemies. The King first gaue him a gard, afterwards he put him in prison, and in the end to death. But first he propounded to his Councell of conscience, what punishment a Kings sonne deserued, that had entred into League against his Estates, and had conspired against his fathers life, and whether hee might call him in question. His Councell layed before him two remedies, both iust & possible, the one of Grace and Pardon, the other of Iustice and punishment, and the difference betwixt the mercie of a father, and the seueritie of a King, saying, that if by his clemencie he did pardon them which loued him not, hee could not but pardon that creature which he should most affect. They desired him to imitate the Emperour Charlemagne, who imputed the first conspiracy of his sonne Pepin against him, to lightnes of youth, and for the second, hee confined him into a Monasterie, protesting that hee was a father, not a King nor a Iudge against his Sonne. The King answered, that by the law of Nature hee loued his sonne more then him selfe, but by the law of God, the good and safetie of his subiects went before it. Moreover, he 1598. A hee demaunded of them, if knowing the miseries which the impunitie or dissimulation of his sonnes offences would breed, he might with safetie of conscience pardon him, and not bee guiltie of those miseries. Hereat his Diuines shronke in their shouldrers, and with teares in their eyes sayd, that the health of his people ought to bee dearer vnto him then that of his Sonne, and that hee ought to pardon offences, but such crimes, (as abhominable monsters, must be suppressed. Hereupon the King committed his Son) to the Censure of the Inquisitors, commaunding them not to respect his authoritie, no more then the meanest within his Kingdome, and to regard the qualitie of his Son as if he were a King borne, making no distinction therof from the partie accused, vntill they found that the excesse of his offence would no more admit of this consideration, remembering that they carried in their soules a liuely Image of the King which had iudged Angels, and should without distinction iudge Kings, and the Sonnes of Kings, like vnto other men, referring all vnto their consciences, and discharging his owne.

The Inquisitors, for the practises which hee had with the enemies of his religion, declared him an Heretike, and for that he had conspired against his fathers life, condemned him to die. The King was his accuser, and the Inquisitors his Iudges, but the Iudgement was signed by the King, which done, they presented many kinds of death, in picture vnto the Prince, to make choise of the easiest. In the end hee demaunded, if there were no pittie in his father to pardon him, no fauour in his Councell for a Prince of Spanie, nor no wisdom to excuse the follies of his youth: when as they told him, that his death was determined, and might not be reuoked, and that all the fauour was in the choise of the mildest death. He sayd, that they might put him to what death they pleased: that there was no choise of any death, seeing they could not giue him that which Cesar held to be the best. These last words, deliuered with passion, were followed with a thousand curses against his Fortune, against the inhumanitie of his Father, and the crueltie of the Inquisition, repeating verie often these wordes. O miserable sonne of a more miserable father. Hee had some dayes of respite giuen him, to prepare himselfe for death. One morning foure slaues entred into his chamber, who awaking him, put him in mind of his last houre, and gaue him small time to prepare vnto God. Hee start vp sodainly and fled to the bed post, but two of them held his armes, and one his feet, and the fourth strangled him with a cord of silke. Many hold, that hee died of letting bloud, his feete being in warme water. The death of the Queene of Spainie foure moneths after, made the world to suspect other causes of his death.

The King was also vnfortunate in his enterprises, against Flanders and England, hauing prepared a great fleet, which perished in the narrow Seas, almost without any fight. Hee is blamed for his crueltie against the Indians, whome hee abandoned to the slaughter like vnto brute beasts. Hee had foure wiues after that of Portugal. He married with Marie Queene of England, by whome hee had no children. His third was Elizabeth of France (surnamed by the Spaniards the Queene of Peace) by whome hee had two daughters, the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia now Archduchesse, and the Infanta Catharina Michelle who was Duchesse of Sauoy. The fourth was Anna of Austria, daughter to the Emperour Maximilian, and his owne proper Neece, by whome hee had three Sonnes, and one daughter, of the which there now remains the Prince Charles Laurence, surnamed at his comming to the Crowne, Philip the third. Hee affected the Empire as much as might be, and not able to attaine vnto it, hee sought the title of Emperour of Spainie: Spainie ambitious yea hee was resolved to go to the Indies, to take vpon him the title of Emperour of America.

Spainie: ambitious.

After all his ambitious proiects vpon Affricke, his attempts against Ireland, and his intelligences with the Turkes, Barbarians and Persians, whome he hath sought to diuide and to make vse of, euen against Christian Princes, but chiefly and especially 1598. cially against France, yet in the end hee was forced to confesse, That all the power and pompe of this world was mere vanitie. He reigned about fortie yeares, and was buried with his Ancestors, as he had ordayned. We haue said that hee drew a writing out of a little Cabinet, and deliuered it vnto his sonne. Some writers say, that it was a translation into Spanish, of the Instruction which the King S. Lewis gaue vnto his Sonne Philip the hardie. Others say it was the Instruction which followes.

Instruction of the King of Spain to the Prince his Sonne.

My sonne, I haue bene alwaies sollicitous and carefull to leaue you your Estates peacefull, and quiet: but neither the many yeares which I haue liued, nor the assistance of Princes my Allies could euer purchase it. I confesse I haue spent in lesse then 33. yeares, five hundred nintie and foure millions of ducats, all which haue bred me nothing but cares and troubles. It is true, I haue conquered Portugal: but as France did hardly escape me, so may this bee withdrawne from me. I would to God I had followed the aduice of my deceased father of famous memorie, or at the least, that you would beleeue and follow mine, I should then beare my crosses more lightly, & should die with more content, leauing you in this vallie of miseries. Behold then what I leaue you for an euerlasting testament, about so many Kingdomes and Seigneuries, to represent vnto you as in a glasse, after what manner you shall gouerne your selfe after my death.

Be alwaies very watchfull of the change of Kingdomes, to make your profit thereby according to occurrents. Haue an eye ouer those that are most familiar with you in Councell. You haue two meanes to maintaine your Realmes of Spain: the one is the present government, the other the nauigation of the Indies. As for the government, you must either relie vpon the Nobilitie, or vpon the Clergie. If you leane vnto Churchmen, keepe the other in awe, as I haue done. but if you fortifie your selfe with the Nobilitie, shorten the reuenues of the Clergie as much as you may. If you seeke to entertaine their friendships equally, they will wast you, disquiet your realmes, whereof you shall neuer see a finall end. If you will make vse of the Nobilitie, my aduice is, that you keepe good correspondencie with the Low Countries, for that they be friends to the French, English, and some Princes of Germanie. Italie, Poland, Sueden, Denmarke: and Scotland can little helpe you therein. The King of Scotland is poore: Denmarke drawes his reuenues from forraignations: Sueden is alwaies in faction, and besides ill situated. The Polonians are alwaies masters of their Kings. Although Italie bee rich, yet is it farre off, and the Princes are of diuers humors. Contrariwise, the Low Countries are rich in men, and shipping, constant in trauell, diligent in seeking out, hardie to begin and attempt, and willing to suffer. It is true, I haue giuen them to your Sister, but what is that? There are a thousand euasions, whereof you may make vse in time. The cheefe are, that you alwaies mainteine your selfe Tutor vnto her children, and that they alter nothing in matters of Religion, for these two points taken away, you are wholly wiped of those Countries. Hold good correspondencie with the Popes, giue them bountifullly, bee courteous vnto them, entertaine their most familiar Cardinals, and labour to haue credit in their Conclauie. Keepe the friendship of the Bishops of Germanie, but let not their pensions be any more distributed by the Emperour. Make them to know you, they will serue you the more willingly, & will receiue your presents with more content. Draw not any neere vnto you that are of base condition, respecting the Nobilitie and the Commons equally: for to speake the truth, their pride is great, they are mightie in riches, and whatsoever they desire must bee done: they will bee a burthen vnto you, and in the end they will become your masters.

Serue your selfe then of the Nobles of the cheefest families, and aduance them to Preferments of great Reuenues. The common sort are not so needfull, for that they may procure you a thousand discontents, which will consume you. Beleeue not any of them if they bee not of qualitie: free your selfe from English spies, and discharge you of French pensions. Serue your selfe boldly with some of the Noblemen of the Low Countries, whome you shall haue alwaies bound vnto you by fealties.

A fealty. As for the nauigation of the East and West Indies, therein consistes the power of Spain, and the bridle of the Italians, from the which you cannot exclude France nor England, for that their Power is great, their Marriners, and Saylers many, the Sea large, their Marchants too rich, their Subiects too greedie of money, and their Seruants too faithfull.

I haue excluded the lowe Countries: but I feare that in time mens humors may change: and therefore you must do two things, change your officers at the West Indies often: those which you call home, make them of your counsell for the Indies. so in my opinion you shall neuer bee deceiued, but both the one and the other will make knowne vnto you the profit, and seeke for more honour. Do you not see how the English seeke to deprive you of that commodity, as hee is mighty at Sea, in men and shippes, (as for the French I do not feare them) So fortifie your selfe with them of the Lowe Countrie, (although they be partly Heretikes and would continue so,) vpon condition that they may freely sell their Marchandise in Spain and Italie, paying the King his customes and other rights: and obtrayning passport to sayle to the East and West Indies, putting in Caution heere, and taking an oath that at their returne they should come and discharge in Spain, vpon paine of punishment, if they did otherwise. I thinke they will not refuse nor deny to obserue it.

And by this meanes the riches of the Indies and Spain shalbe common, and shall haue free commerce with the Low Countries, whereby both France and England shall bee disapointed. My Sonne, I could set before your eyes greater desires for the conquering of Kingdomes, but you shall finde in my Cabynet the aduertisements and discourses which haue bene giuen mee. Commaund Christopher de Mora to deliuer you the Key presently, least those secrets fall into some others mans hands. I haue caused some breeces of these memorialls to bee burnt the seauenth of September. I doubt all are not suppressed: bee carefull to enquire for them. I haue this day added: If you can reconcile Antonio de Perez, drawe him, if you may, into Italie, or at the least that hee promise to serue you in some other of your Kingdomes: but suffer him not to returne into Spain, nor to go into the Lowe Countries. Touching your marriage, the instructions are in the custodie of Secretary Loo. Readethis often it is all of my owne hand writing. Bee watchfull alwaies ouer your most secret Councillors: accustome your selfe to ciphers: discontent not your Secretaries, let them alwaies bee employed, bee it about matters of importance or otherwise: trie them rather by your enemies, then by your friends. If you discouery your secrets to any familiar friend, keepe alwaies the most important within your owne bosome.

A peace being proclaimed in France, the King applies his thoughts to reforme all disorders, and to administer Iustice to all his Subiects: And for the better assurance of the publicke tranquillity, hee did as his Predecessors had done in the like occasions: prohibiting, by the aduice of his Princes, Officers of his Crowne and Lords of his Councell, the carriage and vse of Harguebuses, Petronells, Pistolls, Pistollets, and other Weapons, vpon confiscation of Armes and Horse, and two hundred Crownes fine for the first offence, and to bee kept in prison vntill the money were paid: and for the second, losse of goods and life, without hope of remission. Allowing all men to stay and arrest all such as should carry such prohibited armes eight daies after the publication of the Edict. None were excepted, but the foure hundred Archers and the foure companies of Horse-backe of the gards of his person, when as they waited in quarter, the Archers of the Prouost of his house-hold, of the Constable and Marshallis of France, and they of the companie of light Horse belonging to the Duke of Vandosme, who by the Edict might carrie Pistolls when as they were in seruice. And to free his Subiects from the oppression of Soldiers, & to accustome them to obedience, to who it is troublesome in the securest Peace, he cut off the companies, as well of Horse, as of regiments of Foote: but this restraint

Taxes remitted.

Peace doth change the exercise of Warre into hunting: the King made it his daily exercise. Being one day hunting in the great forest of Fontainebleau, there was heard about halfe a League off, a great cry of hownds, and the winding of hornes, and suddenly all this noyse which seemed to bee farre off, came (to his iudgement) within twenty paces of his eare. Hee commanded the Count Soissons to let out, and to see what it was, thinking that no man durst presume so boldly to interrupt his sports: the Earle aduancing heard the noyse, yet could not discern whence it came. A big blacke man presented himselfe in the thickest of the bushes, crying out, Do you vnderstand me, and then he suddenly vanished away. At those words, they which were discrete thought it great indiscretion to stay longer there a hunting. The Heardsimen thereabouts say it is a spirit, which they call the great Hunter, who hunts in this forest: others hold, that it is Saint Huberts chase, the which is also heard in other places.

Many Noblemen, and Gentlemen retired themselves now vnto their governments and priuate honours: the King hauing sayd long before, that he would force euery man to liue of his owne, and not to importune him any more. Neuer any Edict was better obserued then this speech, for euen then he resolved to imploy the remainder of his reuenues in publicke necessities, and not in the prodigalities of Vitelius, nor for the enriching of priuate men; saying that hee would ease the poore, and giue example vnto the rich to content themselves with little, and to liue accordingly. The Constable went to his government of Languedoc, hauing obteyned of the King a reuerfion of his government for Henry of Montmorency his Sonne. The King in his wisedome, thought he could not sufficiently grace a house which hath brought forth so many Gouernors, Admiralls, Marshalls and Constables, and which vnder the name of Montmorency comprehends that of Horne and Lual, which hath giuen wiues to Kings of France and Dukes of Britaine. The letters-patents were read and registred in the Court of Aides at Montpellier, the Duke of Montadour being President, and the Bishop of Agde and Arles assisting.

The order which the King did settle for the affaires of his house, was a President to all France, shewing the religious desire which hee had to see his subjects enioye the fruits thereof. His Iustice would not suffer them to be charged and overcharged with impossible duties, seeing that the violence of the Warre had left them nothing but their tongues to complaine, being like vnto a kinne laied vpon a dead mans bones. Yet notwithstanding they were forced to pay the publicke charges for the fruites which they had not gathered. And therefore the King did vnto his subjects, as Constantin and Theodosius did vnto them of the Empire, by a generall discharge of the remainder of their tax and tributes. Hee also sent, according to the resolution of the Estates held at Rouen, many great personages, as well of his Councell as of other companies, to examine the necessities of his people, to order the taxes and tributes, & to protect the weak from the oppression & violence of such as during the civil Warres had seen no light of Iustice, but through the flame of Harguebuzes: hauing so abused the time as to enioye the privilege of Nobles, they would be so esteemed rather by their shewe, then by the vse and seruice of the sword: and when as of Nobility, (which doth chiefly bind Noblemen by reason of their Tenures and titles of Nobility, to the duties of armes) hath conured them to succor the necessities of their Prince and Countries, they haue thrust themselves among the people, lying idely in Townes, or in the delights of their houses, so long as fire and danger were in field.

A field. Men vnworthy of the name of men, of Gentlemen, and of Frenchmen. The Commissioners forced these kinde of gallants to pay, who by pretended letters of their Inuolung, and abuse of the Priuileges, had laied their Taxes vpon the people.

While the King labours to reforme all abuses, and to roote out disorders: the deputies of the Clergy of France (being assembled together at Paris, with the Kings permission) beseech his Maiesty to reforme the disorders of the Church. Which speech was deliuered with great reuerence before his M. by the reuerent Francis de la Guesle Arch-bishop of Tours, accompanied with many of the faied deputies of the Clergie. The Summe whereof was.

That it would please his Maiesty, that the holy Council of Trent might be received and published in France, with such necessary qualifications as concerne the French liberties, the Immunities of Churches, and the priuileges of Parliaments.

That his Maiesty would not charge his conscience with the nomination vnto Bishops, Abbeyes, and other benefices hauing charge of soules.

That lay pensions giuen in recompence to Noblemen and Gentlemen vpon the sayd nominations, may be reuoked.

That Clergy-men may be suffered to enioy their liuings quietly without charge, but only to do their duties in the seruice of God and the Church.

That Churches may not be prophaned, nor the Incumbents houses suffered to go to ruine, but to be well and duely mainteyned, to the ende they may not pretend any iust cause of non residence: and to separate them from the common & licentious conuerfing with the people, for the auoiding of scandales which do often followe.

That all reuerfions of Benefices may be taken away, as well for that it is against the Cannon Lawe and the holy Constitutions of Councils, as also for that it is a cause to shorten the liues of the Incumbents.

That the Contracts before time passed betwixt their Maiesties and the Clergy, may be confirmed without breach, or supposition, for the Subsidy granted vnto his Maiesty by the Clergie.

That it would also please his Maiesty to provide them conuenient remedies vpon the complaints which they had presented vnto him.

Wherevnto the King made a very short, but a pithy answer: the effect was this. I confesse that what you haue saied is true, but I am not the author of these Innouations: these mitchieues were brought in before my coming. During the Warres I haue runne to the greatest fire, to quench it: I will nowe do what is needfull in time of Peace. I know that Religion and Iustice be the foundations and pillars of this Estate, the which is maintained by Pietie and Iustice. But if they were not, I would plant them by little and little, as I do all things, with the helpe of God. I will settle the Church in as good Estate as it was a hundred yeares since, as well for the discharge of my conscience, as for your content. but Paris was not al built in one daie. Let the people be as much perswaded by your good examples to do well, as they haue beene heretofore dissuaded. You haue exhorted me of my duty. I do admonish you of yours: let vs all do good. Go you one way, and I will go another: if wee meete, we shall soone haue done. My Predecessors haue giuen you Words, but I with my graie Licket will giue you Deeds. I am all gray without, but I am all of Gold within. I will write vnto my Councell to see your complaints, and will provide for you as fauorably as I may.

During these admonitions of the Clergy, the Cardinall of Florence moued the King for the restitution of the Iesuites. The 7. Article of the treaty of Peace at Verdun did suffer the Subjects and seruants of either side, as well Clergy men as Laye, to retorne & enioy their Offices, Benefices & Reuenues, obtrayning permission & letters patents vnder the broad seale from the Prince. Many thought that the Iesuits should be comprehended in this Article, and that if by this Peace the Spaniards were held Alhes, and as it were Cousin germaines to the French, those whom the Kings Aduocate had the yeare before in open Parliament termed Emissaires to the King of Spain, should 1598 returne to their Colleges, from whence they had bin expelled by a sentence given in December, in the year 1594. But the light of Peace shines not vpon them. The new world which it doth produce, hauing cast the cinders of Warre, Rancor and Reuenge into the Aire, allows them no retreat within the Iurisdiction of Paris. The decrees which had banished them, are grauen in Marble, the Water of Prayers, Fauours and Teares, although it perceeth Stoanes, preuailes nothing.

The Kings
only Sister married to the Prince of Lorraine.

At the same time was concluded the marriage of Madame Catherine Princess of France and of Nauarre, the Kings only Sister, with the Marquis of Pont, Duke of Bar and Prince of Lorraine, after many Iournyes made by the sayd Prince vnto the most Christian King: in which accord there were great difficulties, as well by reason of the diuersity of Religion (the sayd Princess refusing to leaue the reformed, where she had bene bred) as also for that she could not be perswaded to go out of France. She had bene formerly fought by many great Princes, to whom shee would not consent, for the one or the other of these two causes, and sometimes for both together. Francis Monsieur Duke of Alençon desired her in the year 1582. but the difficulty was then greater for matters of Religion. And before that, King Henry the 3. comming out of Poland did affect her: and it is thought, that if he had seene her at Lion at his returne, he would haue married her: but Katherine de Medicis the Queene Mother described her to be a Dwarf and crooked (the which was most false) for she was of a meane stature, and of a good countenance. It is true, she had one legge somewhat shorter than another (which is a make of the house of Albret: for so had Alain Lord of Albret, father to King John, great Grand-father to the sayd Princess Katherine) The Queene Mother did this good turne for her God-daughter, seeking to disgrace the King of Nauarre, whom she hated from his youth, vpon an imagination, being told by an Italian Sooth-sayer, that he should succeed her Children. Then the Duke of Lorraine (who since was her Father in Law) sought her. The Prince of Condy loved her. The King of Spain sent to see her, in the year 1580. promising great aduancement to the King of Nauarre.

This sayling, the Duke of Sauoy sent wife in the year 83. promising no waite to impeach her Religion. His Agent being refused, he went into Spain about his marriage with the Infanta Catherine Michelle. In the year 86. the King of Scotland sent Master D Melain a Scottishman, and others. The Prince of Anhalt being come to the succour of the King her Brother, at his first comming to the Crowne of France, demanded her himselfe in person: but through the necessity of the Warres which were disputed throughout all France, he returned as hee came, with some discontent. During these Warres two Princes of the blood affected her, the Earle of Soissons, and the Duke of Montpensier: but the neerenesse of blood, the diuersity of Religion, and the indisposition of affaires hindered the effect of their desires. So as in the end he enioyed her to whom God had appointed her. The ceremonies obserued at this marriage, wee will shew in the following year.

Troubles for the Duchy of Ferra.

In Italy there grew newe stirres by reason of the death of Alphonso d'Esté Duke of Ferrara, who was the last of that Noble house of Esté. The Duchie of Ferrara is a masculine fee (for so the Lawes call it) belonging to the Holy Sea. This fee had in former times bene granted to the family of Esté, by the Holy Sea, in regard of seruises done by them vnto the Church, vpon condition that the Males onely should hold the sayd Duchie, and for want thereof it should returne againe vnto the Church, to dispose thereof as it pleased.

Alphonso then being deceased without lawfull heires Males, the Church demands her right, and for this effect there were great stirres on either side. Duke Alphonso had in his life time labored all hee could to settle Cesar de Esté, his last Brothers Sonne, in the right of this dignity and the succession thereof: for the obtayning whereof he had vsed the intercession of the most Christian King of France, of the Duke and Seigneury of Venise, of the Duke of Florence, and other great Princes as well Italians as Germanes, and euen of the Emperour himselfe: but he could neuer obtaine this fauour, although

A although hee offered great summes of money, equalling in a manner the value of the said Duchie: wherewith he grew so discontented, as dying, he aduised his nephew the Bastard, to seeke by al meanes to maintaine himselfe in the said Duchie by armes, procuring him the fauour of Princes his Allyes, Confederats, Neighbours, and Friends. There was much expected from the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, of the house of Lorraine, by reason of the famous Princess their mother, who was daughter to the Duke of Ferrara, and to Madam Renée daughter to Lewis the 12. King of France: but the pietie of the most Christian King, and the modestie of those Princes would not suffer them to attempt any thing against the Church. Yet Cesar (although hee were base) takes vpon him the title of Duke: hee fortifies himselfe, leuies men, and prepares for a braue defence. Hereupon Pope Clement the eight, holds a Conclauce, and resolues with his Cardinals, that the said Cesar should bee called to Rome, to yeeld his obedience, and in the meane time nothing should bee attempted, but all should remaine in peace.

to arrive.

Cesar refuseth to obey, and seekes the fauour of his vnckles friends: So as many inclined in the beginning to giue him succours, and there were great controuersies among the Doctors, vpon this point of Law. Qui filij sint legitimi. Some affirming, that bastards may succeed, being once aduowed to be of the blood. Others sayd, that they could in no sort inherit, although they were aduowed. In the end all inclined to the Holy Sea, considering the cōditions of the institution made to the first of the familie by the Church. Yet Cesar fainted not, but scornes all that was attempted against him. The Pope excommunicates him, and all his adherents. Neither doth that dismay him, but he giues them battaile nere to Boulognia, where many wereaine, but more of the Popes side then of his. He seekes by offer of money to pacifie the Pope and Cardinals, but he preuailes nothing. His friends by little and little grew cold, and dealt no more but by secret Intelligences: He sees the danger wherinto hee was readie to fall, not onely to loose what hee demaunded but also his fathers inheritance, which was not called into question. So as in the end, hee resolues to submit himselfe, and to obtaine as profitable a Peace as he could. After much consultation, in the end a conclusion was made at Faenza containing sundrie articles.

D Thus ended the warre of Ferrara, whereupon his Holines resolued to go thither. After hee had visited the holy places of Rome, hee departs, accompanied with seuen and twentie Cardinals, foure and thirtie Bishoppes, and fise hundred Knights and gentlemen: hee fell sicke at Camerate, whereupon processions were made in Rome, and the prisons set open. Hee past by Laurotto, and visited our Ladies Chappell. The Duke of Vrbino receiued, and conducted him through his Countie, where the Dukes Cesar and Alexander d'Esté, with the Earle of Mirandol came to kisse his feete. After that the Cardinall Aldobrandin his nephew had receiued the homage of the Cittie and Duchie of Ferrara, his Holines made his entrie with great solemnitie, whereas he continued all that Summer.

E The King of Spain, before his death, had concluded a marriage betwixt his Sonne, and Margaret daughter to the Archduke of Austria of Gratze, yongest sister to Marie (who being promised him to wife, died before the espousals. Albert the Archduke had commaundement to go and receiue the said Margaret at Gratze, to conduct her into Spain: but being readie to depart, and hauing sent the Admirall of Arragon, Captaine Generall of his armie, into the Countie of the Duke of Isilliers and Cleues, hee receiued newes of the death of the King of Spain. Notwithstanding hee went on his journey, and met with the Princess Margaret of Austria, not farre from the same place, whereas the Emperour Charles the fit, and Ferdinand his brother would haue a memoriall left of their happie enteruiewe comming from diuers parts, the which is represented in a table. This Princess was accompanied by her mother, being of the house of Bauiere, and fise hundred gentlemen of high Hungarie, where the Archduke her father hath most commonly his cheefe aboad.

The nine and twentieth of October they came to Trent, and so entering the territories of the Venetians, two Senators were sent by the Seignurie to receive the sayd future Queene with great honour, in a Village named Delee, (situated vpon the bankes of the riuer of Athesio, called by the Italians, L' Adice) whereas they passed by an artificial bridge newly made by commaundement of the Seignurie. There were in the future Queenes, and the Archdukes traynes, about 2000. horse, and three thousand five hundred men: all which were defrayed ten dayes together by the State of Venice.

Being past Ferona, they entred into the Duke of *Mantua*s Countrie. There is a small Towne called Ossia, vpon the bankes of Po: thither Vincenzo Gonzague Duke of Mantua came in post with ten Noblemen, to salute the Queene. There were boates prepared to passe the riuer, being all very richly appointed: among the rest, there was one Nuptiall barke, into the which, the future Queene with her mother, the Archduke, the Noblemen, and Ladies entred: it was diuided into Parlours, Chambers, and Cabinets, hanged with cloth of siluer. Being entred, the Queene found the table layd and furnished with all exquisite seruices of meate: from thence they were carried downe the riuer to Ferrara, where the Pope had remayned since the composition made at Faence with Cesar Duke of Este.

The Pope being assured of the sayd Queenes arrivall, he presently sent the Cardinals Aldobrandin, and Saint Clement, his Legats, with a great number of Prelats, and gentlemen to meet her. They met the Queene three miles off, euen as shee landed, and received her very honorably, in the name of the Holy Apostolike See, and of the Holy father, presenting her a very rich Carrosse, the iowke being all gilt, & drawne by 4. white horses, in the which she entred Ferrara, with her Mother & the Archduke.

Without the Cittie gate, the Duke of Sessa, Ambassador for the Catholike King, attended her, and presented vnto her in the name of the sayd King, a litter covered with cloth of siluer & guilt, with two white Moyles, with rich harnesses, and the Maitriers in the same lincerie, and withall a Carrosse with sixe pied horses, and two Coachmen in cloth of gold. At the Cittie gate, called Angels gate, she was received by two other Cardinals, Sforce and Montalto, and led into a house artificially made, where she was seated in a royall throne, attending the rest of the Cardinals that went to receive her. After this the sayd Queene, mounted vpon a white Steed, & the Princess her mother D vpon the like, which were sent them by his Holines, & so entred into the Cittie, being late. The Queene went betwixt the two Cardinals, with her Duch gard about her, and her mother following after with Albertus the Archduke. The Constable of Lombardie, (as they call him after the Spanish manner) the Duke of Aumale, the Earle of Gand, the Prince of Orange, the Earle Nietriessin, and many other Noblemen of great name and authoritie, followed them, with a great number of Carosses, and Coaches, in the which the Ladies and gentlewomen were: and in this order shee arrived at the Emperours Ambassadors lodging, passing vnder many triumphant arches.

The future Queene being come vnto the Pallace, shee mounted vp, and retired E her selfe into a chamber, neere vnto the Holy Consistorie, where the Pope was set in his Pontificall throne, with the Colledge of Cardinals, staying there vntill the Oration was made by Bernardin Lesiot of Milan, in prayse of the house of Austria, and of the happie arrivall of the sayd future Queene. Which done, shee, her mother, and the Archduke were brought in, and admitted to kisse his Holines feet, who received them graciously, and gave them his Benediction.

The next day, hauing bin present at the Masse, which the Pope did say, the Queene, her mother, and the Archduke, were seasted at the Popes table. But the Sunday following, which was the fifteenth of Nouember, and appointed for the marriage, all hauing left their mourning weedes for the death of the King of Spain, they put on their Nuptial robes. His Holynes was gone before to the Cathedrall Church, with his Pontificall Roabes and Diademe, sitting in his throne to celebrate the Masse.

The said Queene attyred in white, glistering with Pearle, and precious Stones of inestimable Amable price, beeing followed by her Mother, the Arch-duke and all the troupe of Princes, Noblemen and Ladies, was soled by the Cardinalls of Santiquatro and Farnesse, as a bride vnto the same Church, the which glistered all with hangings of cloth of siluer. Being placed in her Throne all of Gold, vnder a cloth of Estate of the same, and her Mother with her, and the Arch-duke beeing set in another of the same, the Pope began the Masse: then the Queene was conducted towards the Pope by the Cardinalls, with her Mother and a great traine of Ladies, and the Arch-duke approached in like sort, being followed by the Princes and Noblemen.

The King of Spaines procurator to the Arch-duke beeing read, the Pope did celebrate the marriage, betwixt Philip the 3. King of Spain, in the person of Albert his Uncle, substituted by him, to that end, and appeering in his name on the one part, and Queene Marguerite being present on the other part: She returning vnto her Throne, all the Princes saluted her, congratulating her marriage, with wishes of all happinesse. The Arch-duke continued still before the Pope, vntill the Duke of Sessa came with the like procurator from the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, which being read, the sayd Infanta was married by her deputy to the Arch-duke Albert, by the Popes hand. The Masse being ended, the Pope caused the married Queene to approach neere the Altar, giuing vnto her a Rose all of gold consecrated, the which his Holinesse doth vsually giue vnto Queenes and Princesses, as hee is accustomed to send a Sword and a Hat to the chiefe Princes of Christendome.

C From Ferrara the Queene went to Mantua, where the Duke received her very honorably, and entertained her with her whole traine, being esteemed to be 5000. men, and 4000. horse, nine whole daies: from thence they passe by Cremona to Milan, which belongs vnto the King of Spain, where they resolved to attend the Kings farther pleasure. Let vs now see what passed in the Lowe Countries since the Arch-dukes departure from Bruxelles. We haue noted in the 3. demaund which the Admirall of Arragon made vnto the Emperour, that the Duke of Tuilliers was a widower, without heires, and weake of spirit, which caused trouble in his Country, whereof they had concluded the usurpation at Bruxelles, but it must haue some pretext. A Peace being concluded in France, the Arch-duke prepares to make Warre against the States, hee lends D a great Army, whereof he made the Admirall his Generall, commanding him to passe the Meuze with all speede, to enter into the Duke of Tuilliers Countrie, and to seize vpon as many places as hee could vpon the Rhine, and to fortifie them, that hee might be the stronger vpon all occasions, and haue thereby a more easie entry to make Warre in Friseland, Zuiphen, and other Prouinces beyond the Rhine.

The Admirall, according to his commandement, passed the Meuze with his whole Army, nere vnto Ruremonde, in the beginning of September, consisting of 178. Ensignes of foote, of all nations, Spaniards, Italians, Bourguignons, Germaines, Wallons, Irisb and others, making about 25000. foote, and 25. companies of Horses, besides 12. which hee had left in Brabant, so as his whole armie was neere 30000. men. Ha- E uing past the Meuze, hee dispersed his troupes in the Countrie of Tuilliers, the Diocese of Cologne and there abouts, so as approaching the Rhine, he sent the Colonel Barlotte to passe it first, and to maintaine the passage for the rest: the which he did at Kerckraet, betwixt Cologne and Bonne, whether hee drewe downe all the boates hee could recouer, hauing past onely with 800. men of his regiment and some field peeces, with the which going downe the Rhine beneath Cologne, hee chased away all the States shippes that were vpon the Riuer: where hauing gathered together all the barkes and boates hee could find, hee passed the rest of his regiment with some more artillery. The Admirall, the Earle of Berghes and other Noblemen marched thither, and approaching neere the Rhine, they came first with their troupes before Oryoy, a place easie to fortifie, F lying vpon the Rhine, belonging to the Duke of Cleues. The Admirall summoned it, & desired to haue entrance to passe the Rhine. The Lord of Horsb, Marshal of Cleue-land, and the Secretarie, would haue made refusall, pretending their neutralitie: but the Inhabitants beeing terrified, and vpon promise that they would but passe the Rhine, they 1598. they suffered them to enter. Having the Towne at his deuotion, hee came before the Castle. Where there was a garrison of some souldiars of the Duke of Cleues, whom hee did so terrefie, threatening to hang them, as they yeelded it presently: whereas hee lodged, and fortified Orfey speedily, passing three regiments of Spaniards there, with that of Count Bouquoy, with twelue companies of Horse, the which camped right against the Towne, whilest that the Admirall caused a strong fort to be built at Walsom, vpon the other banke of the Rhine, to haue the passage free. In the meane time the Spaniards spoile many other Townes in the Duke of Cleues Country and in Westphalia.

Prince Maurice his exploits.

This soden comming of the Admirall into the territories of the Empire, awakened Prince Maurice, who parting speedily from the Haghe, appointed the rendezvous for his troupes about Arnhem in Guelderland, where he arrived the 13. of September, resolving to make head against the Spaniard. The 25. of September the Estates of the Duke of Swilliers assembled, where it was concluded, That the Duke should write as well to the Emperour, as to the Princes Electors, to demande succors against the Admiralls attempts, That commandement should be given to the Earle of Lippe, Capitaine generall of the nether Circle of Westphalia, to assemble the five lower Circles in the Towne of Dormont, that they might seeke to prevent the miseries that were falling on them, and also to stay the leuies, as well of men as of money appointed for the Turkish Warre. That Ambassadors should be sent to Albertus the Arch-duke (who was yet at Niuelle) to complaine of the taking of Orfey and other the Admiralls attempts.

The Arch-dukes answer to the Ambassadors.

Touching the Ambassadors that were sent vnto the Arch-duke, hee made this answer: That hee neuer had any intent to preiudice the Landes belonging vnto the Empire, nor to giue any cause of complaint: but seeing hee was forced to make Warre against his Maiesties rebels, he did aduertise the, that what was done, was by a resolution of the whole Councell. That he intreated his Cousin the Duke of Swilliers not to take it otherwise then in good part. And if hee do not presently leaue Orfey and ruine the fort of Walsom, he will do it vpon the first occasion. That for the present hee doth only hold them to haue a passage vpon the Rhine, for the effecting of desleins against the Rebels. That the Kings men of Warre, both in their passage and lodging should keepe such good order, as none should haue cause to complaine.

The Earle of Brunk besieged and taken in his Castell by the Spaniards, then slain by them and burnt.

But contrary to these promises, the Spaniards tooke Burich, Diuslack in Holt, and Rees in the same Country of Cleues, and all other places and forts there aboutes, chasing and killing the garrisons that were in them. The Earle of Brunk writ also the 20. of the same moneth vnto the Admirall, intreating him to send him a safegard for his Castell of Brunk, his family and Subiects: wherevnto the Admirall answered, that if the said Earle carryed himselfe according to his dutie, he should be receiued into his protection with all loue, and honored according to his merits, the which should be a more assured safe-gard vnto him then paper. Yet the Earle hauing certaine intelligence that the Spaniards intended to force his Castell of Brunk, the 6. of October late at night he sent away his Wife, Daughters, and Gentlewomen: resolving the next day to carry away his richest stuffe. The which he could not do: for the next daie his Castell was beset on all sides by the breake of day, some Cannons planted, and it battered the same day.

Crackly of the Spaniards.

The 8. of that moneth the Earle parled with the Spaniards, and concluded, that the souldiars that were within the Castell should depart with him, and be conducted to a place of safety. Herevpon the Castell was yeelded, and hee went forth with his men, which were all choise Souldiars. But he was presently set vpon by the Spaniards and taken prisoner: the Souldiars to the number of forty, were led into a nere Champaign field, and there disarmed, and all slaine. There remained yet six of the Duke of Swilliers people, who beeing loth to trust vnto the Spaniards cutesie, had retired themselves out of the way, vntill the greatest furie were past.

In the meane time they stript the Earle, whom they had also slaine, if a Capitaine had A had not withdrawne him into a Chamber. And by this meanes, the six Souldiars had also their liues saued: yet they stript two of them naked, whom in derision they placed on either side the Earle: but at his instant request they suffered them all sixe to depart. In the meane time, the Earle had a garde of Halbards in his Chamber, so as none of his people might come neere him, but the Lord of Hardenberg his Cousin, and one Page.

The 10. of the moneth, the Capitaine appointed for the garde of the Castell, came and told the Earle, that he might go walke, if he pleased: wherevnto he answered, That he would willingly, if it might be without danger. After dinner hee had a desire to walke with the Capitaine, in whose company he feared nothing. As he walked, he saw much blood shed along the way, and said to his Page, behold the blood of our seruants. If they haue an intent to do as much to me, I had rather it were to day then to morrow. Going on towards the Riuer of Roer, hee was beaten downe with the Staffe of a Pertuisan or Halberd, and slaine vpon the ground: saying onely, with his hands lift vp to heauen, My God. and had presently two or three thrusts through the body. They left him a while dead vpon the place, and afterwards burnt him.

Those of Wezel, the chiefe towne of Cleues, thinking to free themselves by presents, sent vnto the Admirall, hee returned them an answer, that they should haue peace with him, so as they would restore the Catholike religion, and expell the Protestant Ministers. The which they did, but it would not worke their peace: for he forced them to giue a hundred thousand Kings Dallers, & a thousand quarters of Corne to pay and feed his Armie. Afterwards the Admirall tooke Berke vpon the Rhine, which was held by the States, Emeric, Isseberg, Deutecom (held also by the States) and Schwylembourg: but want of victuals, (his armie being driuen to great extremities) was the cause why he entred no farther into the States Country: desiring nothing more (by reason of the Winter) then a good lodging, to winter his Armie in: so as the 16. of Nouember, he marched vp the Riuer, and lodged them all winter in the Countries of Cleues, Munster, Berghes and Mark.

The Deputies of the neather Circles of Westphalia, whereof the Earle of Lippe was Capitaine generall, being assembled at Dormont, hearing the complaints that were made from diuers parts, of the Admiralls inuasion vpon the territories of the Empire, and the Spaniards outrages, they resolved to write vnto the Emperour, and to the foure Princes Electors vpon the Rhine, that it would please his Imperiall Maiestie, and their Excellencies, to write as well to the Admirall, as to Andrew the Cardinall of Austria, being at Bruxelles, Gouverneur in the absence of his cousin Albertus the Arch-duke, and to the Generall Estates of the vnited Prouinces, that either side should leaue the Townes which they held with any garrisons, vpon the Territories of the Empire, restoring euery one to his Prince or proper Lord. The Princes Electors of the Empire being aduertised hereof, did write presently vnto the Emperour, to whom they sent an ample information of the hostilities committed by the Admirall vpon the lands of the Empire.

The Electors write vnto the Emperour.

Vpon these Letters and aduise of the said Electors, the Emperour did write as well to Albert the Archduke, being at Milan, as to Andrew the Cardinall at Bruxelles: by the which hee commanded them to make reparation for the wrongs their Armie had done, and admonisheth them to carry themselves modestly. He did write also of the same date to the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, and to the Admirall, and therevnto did adde an Imperiall command, whereby he charged them to depart out of the territories of the Empire, restoring the Townes and Castels which they held, vnto their true Lords, and repairing the wrongs which they had done, vpon paine of Proscription. But the Admirall, nor his Spaniards, were not greatly moued at this charge: they must haue other meanes then Edicts, to chase as well the Admirall, as the Prince Maurice out of the limits of the Empire.

All this yeare hath bene very tumultuous, almost throughout all Christendom: Hungarie vexed by the Turke. The troubles of Ferrara had disquieted all Italy:

1598. Italy, if the pietie and wisedome of Pope Clement the 8. had not preuented it. France A was not fully in quiet, but had a suspension and cessation of Armes, by the boornie that Noble King, whom God had happily sent them. England was troubled about the Irishmen, who were ayded and succoured by the Spaniard. Spain being exhausted of money, by reason of the many expeditions which they were forced to make, should feare to see Portugall wrested from them, by the means of Sebastian King of Portugall, whom the Portugais hold to bee yet liuing, and that they did see him die in 1598. Onely Poland had some rest: but sodenly warre disquiets them. Sigismund King of Poland by election, and by succession of Sueden, Gothe and Vandale, was come to make his residencie in Poland, and had left Charles Duke of Suiderman, his Vncle by the Fathers side, for his Viceroy in his Countries of Sueden. By this election which the Polanders had made of Sigismund for their King, who pretended the Duchie of Lithuania by the right of his Mother, it seemed that these two Realmes vnder one King, should haue enioyed a good and a long Peace. But it fell out otherwise, for the Duke of Suiderman did many things in Sueden which Sigismund did not allow off: And therefore he had often intreated the Palatins and chiefe of the States of Poland, to suffer him to go into Sueden: the which with much importunitie they granted. About the middest of Summer he imbarke at Dantzick with an armie, promising to retorne presently.

Sueden.

He arrives at Colmar, a Sea Towne in Sueden. The chiefe cause which hee pretended of his voyage, was to reforme the State of Sueden, and to restore the Catholike Religion. But his Vncle Charles (who was a Lutheran, according to the confession of Ausbourg) much respected both of great and small, knowing the Kings arriuall, and his intention, and seeing that some of the best (although few in number) had gone and yielded vnto the King, he puts himselfe into armes, leuies men in all parts, and opposeth himselfe against the King his Nephew, going to encounter him at Stekenbourg, with whom he had many skirmishes, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse. In this doubtfulnesse of the euent which might ensue, hee sends Deputies to his Nephew, to end their quarrels by a Peace: the which the King refused, saying, that hee would not receiue a law from his Vncle: and so the Deputies returned. The King finding himselfe wronged with this taking of armes, and with these skirmishes and encounters, (wherein hee had lost much,) resolves to Warre, and marcheth towards the Towne of Lincoln. Duke Charles hearing that hee was dislodged, followes him sodenly, and sends him another Mediator for Peace, by an Herauld, after the manner of those Countries: the King gues him no audience, but according to their custome, appoints the place of Battaille. The Kings Armie is ready at the day appointed: but Charles and his people appeare not. The Polonians held themselves for victors, and went to lodge (as they commonly say) after the manner of the French. Charles discouering their estate by his spies, chargeth them being a sleepe, and so were the Polonians surprised and defeated.

Pacification
of Sueden.

The King thinking to do well, caused the Bridges to be broken, which was the cause of a greater losse of his men, who had no other meanes for their safety but to cast themselves into the water, so as in a manner all perished that fled from the Battaille. The King saved himselfe as well as hee could: and sending Deputies to his Vncle for a Peace, in the end it was concluded: First, that all offences past should be forgotten, and neuer more to be remembered, That all Officers of the realme of Sueden, which were at that time with the King, should bee giuen in Hostage to Duke Charles. And that the Estates of Sueden should bee called in the Kings name, within foure moneths, to determine of all controuersies, to whom they referred themselves, promising to allow of whatsoever they should determine. Things thus concluded, the King was expected by his Vncle at Stockholm: but in stead of going thither, he imbarke with his Sister at Stekenbourg, and arriued at Colmar, from whence hee set saile to retorne into Poland. Most of his ships were spoiled, and some perished in the tempest, so as he landed at Dantzick, more like vnto one that had escaped shipwrack, then returned

A returned from a iust nauigation: and it seemed that all aduersities did bandie against his fortune. Such was the successe of King Sigismunds enterprise. 1598.

About the end of September, Omar Bascha Vizir (that is to say, Lieutenant generall to the Turke,) with an armie of three score thousand men, besieged Varadin, a Towne of Transilvania, in the which one Melchior Reder a Silesian Gentleman was Gouvernour, a man of great reputation, as well for his knowledge, as for his practise in Warre: finding the Towne not defensible, he burnt it, and withdrew all he could into the Castell: whereas the Gouvernour *Melchior Reder*ooke an oath of the Souldiers, that none should presume to parlee with the enemy, or once to speake of yeelding, vpon paine of death, as well for the Author of this Councell, as for his Adherent, it hee did not speedily aduertise the Gouvernour. All did sweare willingly, and the Hungarians with them. The Gouvernour did also promise neuer to abandon them, but to carry with them vnto the last gaspe. The Turke continued the siege vntill the 3. of November, and attempted it by Assault, Sappe, and Mine, with all the violence that might be: but he was still repulded with great losse and dishonour, so as in the end they were forced to raise the Siege and go to Zolnot, and so to Buda, leauing a great victorie to the Christians, to their great grieve and shame.

On the other side, the Christians receiued the like repulse before Buda. They went to besiege it the 5. of October, vnder the command of Schwartzbourg and Pulfi, and hauing taken the Suburbs, Mathias the Archduke came: the Forte of Potentiane vpon the Riuer of Danow was taken, and the Turkes so distressed, as the 29. day there remained nothing, but to yeeld (for the Castell of Potentiane being taken, a reasonable breach was made to giue an assault vnto the Towne,) and all the Inhabitants, Men, Women, and Children, cast themselves at the Baschaes feet, seeing the imminent danger, wherevnto he was ready to yeeld: but he durst not, by reason of three other Baschaes that were within the Towne, that of Caramania, that of Natolia, and that of Besie. But there fell such abundance of raine, as all their powder was wet, and wrought no effect, neither by Mine as they tried, nor otherwise: so as they were forced to giue over. The Christians retired themselves into Varadin, and the Turkes into Buda, being well assailed and well defended on eyther side. There died 13000. Turkes before Varadin, and within the Towne a thousand three hundred Christians, and within Buda 1500. Turkes and fewe Christians. But the first of November about 7000. Peasants, with their Wiues and Children, came and yeelded themselves vnto the Christians Armie, they being Christians, and fearing the Turkes reuenge vpon their families.

In December, the Riuer of Tiber at Rome was so strangely swelled, as in lesse then three dayes there was nothing but the euén hills, and some eminent places free from that fearfull inondation. At the first furie, and in lesse then foure houres, it carried away S. Maries Bridge, many houses, and the shops of the Stationers and Droguists, and Storehouses for Wine & Oyle that were about the Castell S. Angelo. Forte prisoners were slaine vnder the ruines of the Tower De Noue, not being able to resist the violence of the water, nor they to be succoured, for that this accident happened by night, which prevented all foresight. On Christmas day, the Churches within Rome were without Priests, without Masse, and without people. The Pope praied vpon the Mountaine, and powred out teares for them that trembled and were drenched below in the Deluge. He gaue so good order, as such as were besieged without by the Water, and within by Famine, were alwaies releued against the violences of the one and the other. Rome was neuer seene in such desolation: the inondation during the siege of Pope Clement the 7. was not so violent.

This yeare the Pope created 16. Cardinals, that is to say, Baronius of the Oratorie of Rome. (It is a Congregation of Priests, which make profession to liue in common, and do exercise themselves in Meditations and Declamations, euery one according to his profession,) He hath shewed by his Annales, the greatnesse of his spirit, which exceeds the Ordinarie of Doctors: Giury Bishop of Lisieux a French man, Bellarmin.

Boulogne.

Supremacy
salus populi.

The King at the conclusion of the treatie of Vernus, was desirous that his good Sister the Queene of England should be comprehended therein. But it was an accord which the King of Spaine would make a part: for the effecting whereof, the King did offer the Towne of Boulogne for an interview of the Deputies, where they mette of both sides: but the Ceremonie for Precedence made it fruitlesse. For whereas the deputies of England would not giue place to them of Spaine, they returned without doing any thing: neither was there any of them that thought it reasonable, to purchase a peace with such a preiudice to his Princes seruice. They say that the peoples health is the Soueraigne lawe: but that which concerns the respect of the Prince, and the ranke which he is to hold before others, is alwayes immutable. There are some Lawes mortall, and others which neuer dye. Those haue their continuance according to the time: Necessitie makes the other alwayes durable, for the perpetuall good they find in the obseruation, as Lucius Valerius said, pleading against the Oppian law. Of the condition of these mortall lawes is the right of Precedence. He that shall suffer the diminution, is not worthy of the increase.

The King
slees at Mon-ceaux.

During this dispute for the Precedence, the King was at Monceaux to take the dyet. The Physitians had giuen him so great liberty to eate Melons of Chenoucean & Lion, as he felt it, and paied deere for the taste of his delights: for the third day of his diet, walking in his doublet in his gallery at Monceaux, a feuer tooke him, which turned his dyet into speedier remedies, and brought him to that estate, as many built their hopes vpon the despaire of his health, and there were posts attended, ready to carry these D dead newes. But the desseignes of Troubles and Factions dyed, when as they saw him recover his former health. The Duchesse of Beaufort serued him in this sicknesse, with an affection and care equall to the loue which makes the louer feele the same griefe that the beloued doth. It was at the same time when as she hoped to be a swel Queene of France, as she reigned in the Kings heart. They said that our Daulphins should be Cesars or Alexanders, and that that which had been but a sport or pleasure, should now be made a Contract of necessity. Being recovered, he came to S. Germaine in Lyce, there to end the yeare, and to resolve vpon his expences. Hee would haue the aduice of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, to acquaint them with the estate of his affaires, to the end that if euery man did not obtaine what he demanded, he should impute the cause vnto necessity. The great tables charged with vnkowne superfluities (more esteemed for the price and rarenesse, then for the tast or necessity,) were then cut off by the Kings example, which hath alwayes more force, then either Law or Correction. Excesse was conuerted into frugality, so necessary in an estate, as the Romaines were no lesse bound to the Figges and Carrots of the Fabricij & Curiij, then to their swords.

Then was there scene a new order in the disposition of the Kings treasure, by the care and indutrie of the Marquis Rhofny, vnto whom his Maiesty gaue the charge of Superintendent. From the first day he let them know how hard it was to draw monie out of the Kings Coffers: & for so many dealers in it as were wont to be, there should now be but one. His humor seemed strange: hee cared not for all the petty Gods, so as he pleased Iupiter, as Apuleius saith. He refused many things, to the end that the grant might be referred for the King, & all fauours receiued from his Maiesties only hand, not from any other, the which hath purchased him many enemies, who enuying his prosper-

Those which are rayed to the Solstice of their greatnes, must consider that Princes fauours are alwayes perillous. It is a difficult thing to stand long firme vpon this ice: and the fall, how gentle soeuer, will neuer suffer him to rise againe. He said them once a day, and did thinke of them continually, Fauour may turne in o di fauour, and grace into disgrace. The Emperour hauing the last yeere (as wee haue formerly sayd) sent an Imperiall commandement, as wel to the Admirall, as to the Prince Maurice, to depart out of the territories of the Empire, and to restore the places they held, vnto their right Lords, whereof they made no great account, finding many delays and shifts to continue there still, to the end they might haue elbowe roome, to rob, and steale, and to winter there: The Princes and Electors of the Rhine, & of the nether Circle of Westphalia, sent their Deputies to Collen, where they did assemble in the beginning of Ianuary, to redresse C those disorders which the Admirall and Prince Maurice had committed, seeing the Emperours letters were so little respected of them. To the same end they did write vnto the Princes and States of the Circles of Franconia, and base Saxony, to moue them ioynly to prepare to armes, to expell as well the Spaniard, as Prince Maurice out of the limits of the Empire, & that to that end the sayd Princes with the five Circles would send their Deputies to Constans the eleuenth of March following. The Deputies of the Princes and States of the Empire at- temble at collen.

The said Deputies being at Collen, madenew complaints by their letters, of the one & twentieth of Ianuary, vnto the Emperour, as well of the Admirall and Spaniards, as of the Prince Maurice, and the States army, beseeching him to grant an Imperiall armie, (which should be commonly of 40000. men) to force both the one and the other to depart out of the lymits of the Empire, and to repayre the losses sustayned by them. D The Emperour writes againe, the eleuenth of February from Prague, to Andrew Cardinall of Austria, Gouernour of the Low Countries, reiterating his commandments, and also to the Admirall, who had newly taken againe the Towne of Emerick, in the Countie of Cleues, the which Prince Maurice had taken from him, and deliuered freely vnto the Duke. It seemed that these two armies played at base in the Countie of Cleues.

The sayd Cardinall and Admirall sent excuses for an answer, both to the Empe- The Elector of Mentz an- swere vnto Carain II Andiew. rour, and to the Deputies at Collen. Ferdinand de Lopes of Villanowa, going from the Cardinall to make his Spanish iustifications vnto the Emperour, he past by the Arch- bishop Elector of Mentz, whome hee thought to make deafe, and blind, presenting vnto him in the Cardinalls name, a tedious writing, containing certaine reasons (like vnto those which William Rodowitz Commissaire for the Admirall, deliuered vnto the Deputies at Collen) wherefore the Spanish armie had entred into the limits of the Em- pire, and why it stayd there: but the Prince Elector of Mentz, gaue him a short and resolute answer: That he could not allow of that which the Cardinall and Arch- duke had attempted against the constitutions of the Empire. As for himselfe, he would not faile in that which concerned his dutie, for a preferuation of the peace and quiet of Germanie, being troubled and disquieted in this manner: aduising the Cardinall for the best, to retire his armie as soone as hee could, out off the lymits of the Em- pire, and not to attend the end of Aprill, to repaire the wrongs done: to restore what they had violently taken, and to make satisfaction for the damages done, as well to the generall as to the particular. In so doing, the Princes, and States of the Empire, should haue occasion somewhat to excuse what was past, & to allow of the vrgent necessitie, wherewith wherewith they seeke to purge and iustifie themselues. This answer was made by A the Elector, the five and twentieth of February. 1599.

The Admirall, in the behalf of the King of Spaine, of Albert Archduke, Andrew Cardinal and in his owne, sent a Commissioner to Colen, to treat with the Deputies of the Princes and States, and especially with that of the Count Lippe, Capitaine generall of the Lower Circle of Westphalia. The sayd Commissioner presented letters of ius-tification from the Admirall to the Deputies, written from Rees, the 20. of Ianuarie, full of allegations, of the necessitie which had moued the King of Spaine, to lodge his armie in those quarters, the better to subdue his enemies and the States. And first for the great benefits the Empire had receiued from the King of Spaine, and the house of Burgundie, it was reciprocally bound to ayde and serue him herein, seeing B that hee was not come thither with any bad intention, not to seize vpon an other mans Countie, nor to wrong any man, but for extreme necessitie, & a sincere affection hee carried to the Empire and the preferuation thereof.

That the States and vniuersal Prouinces were the cause of this mischeefe, who would neuer reconcile themselues vnto the King their Lord: notwithstanding so many offers of good vsage, and intercessions of the Emperour, of other Kings, and of the Princes of Germanie. nor yet the grace and fauour which the King of Spaine hath done them, hauing transported all the Low Countries to the Infanta his daughter, married to Albert the Archduke.

That the said King and Archduke, hauing made him Generall of their armie, the sooner to see him to worke, and to enter into their Countries which were held by their enemies, did thinke that they might well allowe them so much, as to passe by the frontiers of the Empire, to wrest out of the enemies hands, the places which they held, and afterwards to restore them to their true owners.

That through the long delay of the Prince Elector of Colen, after the yeelding vp of Rhinberg and the retreat of the States shippes vpon the Rhine, the sayd army had stayed along the Rhine, pretending to raze Schercks Sconce, lying at one of the Corners of the Rhine. And being comethither, that for the treaties and negotiations which were long in managing, they must remaine there for their maintenance, to free the ri-uer of Rhine, and to keepe the Towne of Orsay: and that for some other reasons, hee D was forced to take the Towne of Burich, to annoy the enemy, & to crosse their defences.

That victuals, and forrage being spent, considering the complaints of their neighbours, many things haue past amongst others, that of the Earle of Broucke, who for his accustomed crueltie, & bad inclination, killing them that went to forrage, hauing condemned all brotherly admonitions, desiring rather to practise armes, then to entertaine friendship, if any misfortune had happened vnto him, he was sorie for it, being reloued to do iustice. That when as the neighbour Countries came to complaine vnto him of iniuries and oppressions which they sayd they endured, he had vpon euery point gi-uen them iust and lawfull excuses. E

That after he had taken the Towne of Bergh, to preuent the policie of his enemies, and receiued money and victuals from them of Wezel, according to their agreement for their ranfome, he raised his army and went to Rees: the which hauing well furnished, he came to Emerick in the view of the enemy, a Towne seated vpon the Rhine, neer vnto the fort of Schenck, the which being strong, both by Art and Nature, and hard accesse by reason of the waters, not easieto batter, and much lesse to giue assault, he left it, and tooke his way by the high Countie, he went before Dentem, which yeelded, and to did the Castle of Schuylenbourg.

That after many consultations of the reason of war, and of the iniurie of the Time, it was found expedient for the preferuation of the armie, to cause it to winter in places neerest to the territories of the Empire, to stoppe the enemies couriers and spoyle: to entertaine the Kings armie during winter, and to haue it alwayes readie.

That many by reason of the strangenes of the fact, being ignorant of the Perill, Ne-cessitie and Profit thereof, haue made their complaints vnto their Princes, who seeing the

A the disc commodities of their Subiects, haue also cōplained vnto him: who hath answered them curteously, commending the good amitie of the Lords confederates vpon the Rhine, and of their Countries, against all inconueniences, putting them in mind of the Kings great benefits, (to his great hazard,) to preferue the Lands and Territories of the Empire from vtter subuersion, to the hindrance of his owne affaires.

That he did thinke by his mild carriage, to haue cut off all cause of complaint, and did hope that hereafter there should bee no mention made to the Emperour, nor in the other Courts and Estates of the Empire, whereof notwithstanding he heard the contrarie, fearing that in this assembly, by the exclamations of some moued with spleene and hatred against the King and the Catholike religion, and through indifferetion or malicetrufting too much to the enemies inconstant promises, or through ingratitude, or some such like cause, that such false reports are againe brought in question.

That he had held it expedient, to aduertise his Imperiall Maiestie, of the Kings merits, and iustifications, against such friuolous complaints, and to send them to the Princes and States of the Empire in writing, and to that Assembly. Intreating them in his Maiesties name and his owne, that without iust occasion, they would not take any bad impression of his Maiesties sincere intention, by an vndue grieue, commiseration or spleene, growing from some smal misdemeanors, which be the ordinary frutes of warre: least they fall into greater inconueniences, and troubles, which might breed a greater mischeefe, whereof would follow a to late repentance. But rather, shew-ing wisdom and Discretion, measuring the good with the bad, comparison being made of small damages and losses, happened on these frontiers of the Empire, ioyning to those of the King, from whence the Empire had receiued so many good turnes, they should take all in good part.

That it will well appeare, with what Bountie, Moderation, Clemencie, Dilligence, and with what Charge, his Maiestie hath, amidst so great troubles and turmoyles of warre, preferued the whole Diocese of Colen and the neighbour Countries, being in danger to bee lost, and the Catholike religion suppressed: and that to the great preiudice of his owne affaires. By the which merits and good deeds, together with the bond by the which the said Diocese and Countie of Westphalia are tyed, no man of Iudgement (if hee will not bee blemished with the note of ingratitude) can with reason blame his Maiesties actions, nor his own, touching the lodging, and wintering of his army, contained in all militarie modestie.

This iustification was tedious: but it was answered, & all the points of vpbraidings and accusations made therein, examined, and reiected, as false, and calumnious, to the preiudice of the Emperours honor, of the Princes and States of the Empire. This Assembly was referred to Conflins. We shall hereafter see what passed there.

We haue before shewed, how that Madam Catherine the Kings only Sister, had bin promised to the Marques of Pont, Prince of Lorraine, and Duke of Barr. The cōtracts were made in the presēce of the Duke of Lorraine, who came into France. The conditions were, that the sayd Lady should be entituled Duchesse of Albret, Countesse of Ar- magnac, and of Rhodes, Vicountesse of Limoges, & should haue for her yeerely portion, a hundred thousand Crowns: and in case shee had any children, they should carry the same titles, and be prouided for. And in case she did suruiue him, she should inioy the Duchie of Bar in Barrois, with a yeerely pension, taken out of the reuenues of Lorraine.

This done, the ancient allyances which had bin betwixt these two houses, were renewed, and the marriage was consummated: but there was first some quest on touching the reformed religion, in the which she had bin bred, the which she would not change, by reason (as she said) of her deceased mother, Queene Joan of Nauarre, whose life & actiōs she held worthy to be imitated. She did with all her heart affect that which did concerne the libertie of Conscience throughout all France, beseeching the King often, to let her see the assurances thereof whilest she was in France, & not to suffer his Edicts to re-maine without execution being proclaymed, and without a durable obseruation being executed. Shee was Daughter to a Mother who preferred safety of cōscience before Moreover, Shee apprehended the reproche of inconstancie at that age, if Shee should change her religion, hauing returned vnto it after Shee had bene a while Catholike: yet Shee promised her future husband to suffer herselfe to be instructed, and to do what he pleased.

The King seeing his sisters resolution, did what he could to reclayme her by mildnes, propounding vnto her his own example, and giuing her to vnderstand by some words, that the must otherwise looke for no fauour at his hands. Seeing hee could not prevail, before he signed the sayd contract (which was at Monceaux, a Castell belonging to the Duckesse of Beaufort, whome the King loued, and the common brute was, that Shee did greatly presse this marriage, by reason of her pretentions: about the end of the yeare, the King told her, that his meaning was not to force her, neither for her Religion, nor for her Marriage. He aduised his future Brother in Law to do his dutie, and so discharge his conscience. He also aduertised him of one expedient, which was, to remoue certaine women, and other persons, from about the sayd Lady, for that her traine consisted of Catholikes, and others, and among those others, there were some wilfull, and contentious, in whome the same Ladie trusted much, for that they had bin bred vp in her seruice from her cradle: but all that proceeded, but from the bountie of the sayd Ladie.

The sayd Prince of Lorraine accompanied with his Brother the Earle of Vandemont, and other Noblemen of Lorraine, with three hundred gentlemen well appointed, a little before January, this yeare 1599. arrived at Paris, in which moneth, the King had appointed the day of the marriage. He entred by Saint Denis gate, the King doing him the honour to enter with him, hauing mett him in the field as hee came from hunting. The King led the sayd Duke his Brother in Law, (calling him commonly brother) to the Louure, where they supped together, and Madam his Sister with them. The time was spent in dancing, and other exercises of recreation, and pastime among the great Princes. The Kings sister for her part shewed all the contentment that might be, as shee had good reason, hauing attained to that which shee was accustomed to say, Grata superueniet qua non sperabitur hora: the sayd Lady being well instructed in the Latin tongue: and free did the more apprehend this Latin verse, for that some had giuen it forth, shee would neuer be married.

According vnto that which the sayd Ladie had promised, to suffer her selfe to be instructed in the Catholike religion, it was resolved by his Maiestie, that there should be a conference betwixt some Catholike Doctors, & some Ministers of the reformed Religion, in the presence of his Sister, but they prevailed nothing for her conuersion. The King foreseeing some inconueniences, resolved (as well to satisfie her conscience, as to auoyd scandall) to have this instruction deferred vntill another time: And in the meane time they should proceed in the marriage. Hereupon there were some practises by the Ministers of the pretended Religion, who would haue the honour (sayd they) that the Kings onely Sister should bee married by them: and that the Prince of Lorraine should seeke his spouse where shee was, and that it was not conuenient shee should seeke him in his Church. In truth this was plausible, and it seemed the Ladie had a great interest in it. But the Prince on the other side, protested neuer to be married by a Minister. So as there was much arguing in what forme they should bee married. But the King, by his accustomed wisdom, shewed the effect of his Authority.

The thirtieth day of January being Sunday, in the morning, the King having aduertised his Sister ouer night of his intention, and intreated the sayd Prince of Lorraine to be ready, hee goes and takes his Sister at her rising, and conducts her by the hand into his Cabinet, where her future Spouse was already. Hee commaunded the worthy and reuerent Archbishop of Reas his naturall Brother, to marrie the sayd Marquis,

A Marquis, Prince and Duke, with the sayd Princess and Duchesse his Sister, by words of the present. Wherevnto the sayd Archbishop at the first made some refusal: saying, That the accustomed solemnities must be therein obserued. Wherevnto hee replied most learnedly: That his presence was more then all other solemnities, and that his Cabinet was a sacred place. And therefore hauing commanded the sayd Archbishop to go on, notwithstanding all difficulties, hee proceeded then to the Nuptiall blessing of the sayd parties present, that were there conioyned in marriage, euen as if they had bene in the greatest Church in Paris, which done, euery one went to his deuotion.

Afterwards the King commanded his Sister to attire her selfe like a Bride: and so B the feast was solemnly celebrated. All the great Officers did assist and serue there in their degrees, with all the grace and Honour the King could deuise to giue vnto the Prince of Lorraine his Brother in Law. This Marriage was Honoured with all kindes of sports and Dancing. About the end of February, the sayd Princess went with her Husband into Lorraine, whereas the Duke gaue her the greatest entertainment hee could deuise, embracing her as his owne Child. There had bene great heart-burning and discontentment, by reason of the diuersitie of Religion. The Kings intentions were, to drowne the remembrance of the bitterness of forepassed reignes, in the mildnesse of his government, and that the common feeling of so many miseries which they had suffered, and which had continued together, should perswade C them to grow familiar and friendly together, and to haue no more occasion to remember things past, then his Maiestie had meaning to remember his owne wrongs. Warre is not dead in an Estate whereas Consciences are diuided: it doth but sleepe, a small matter awakens it: there is nothing more apprehensue, or that doth pierce more violently into the perswasion of Men, to bandie them one against another, then Religion. Euery man thinkes his owne the better, and so iudgeth of it, more by his owne Zeale and Passion, then through Knowledge and Reason. The King, during the Warre, had runne to those things which did most presse him, and to the dangers that D did most import: he had desired to reconcile this diuision, being grieved in his Soule that the impietie of the Warre would not suffer him to make shew of the fruites of his Pietie.

They of the Reformed Religion, made many and great complaints, that the Kings Edicts were not obserued nor kept: that they were not prouided of all things necessarie for the exercise of their Religion: the Liberty of their Consciences, and the safetie of their Persons and Fortunes. They sayd moreover, that they desired not that the order of government of State should bee changed to their profit, or of any forraigne Prince: nor to haue the State torne in peeces, to please the Ambition of some fewe Men, but onely to enioy their Consciences with Peace, and their liues in safetie.

That so many iust requests being granted vnto them by the Edicts of Kings, Predecessors to his Maiestie, demanded and defended by himselfe, with so great Zeale & E Vertue, had not been hearkened vnto vnder his raigne, when as they should best hope, and vnder whom: and had it not been for the affection which they had vnto his Greatnesse, and the foundation which they laied on his good will towards them, they might lawfully and profitably haue practised the wayes which they were forced to hold vnder Kings his Predecessors. But they could not despaire any thing of him, whom God by the Protection of his Church had brought vnto the succession of the Crowne, nor obtaine lesse then Libertie and Life, hauing spent their blouds so freely for him. They complained, that Preaching was banished from his Maiesties Court, to banish them consequently from his house, where they could not serue him without seruing of God. No good man might remaine there, but hee was dayly in danger of murthering, or to bee hurt, without hope of comfort, or assurance of grace.

That they practise dayly to exclude them of the Religion from all Charges and

They beseech him to iudge, if it be reasonable, they should doe wrong vnto their Children, to deprive them by their dulnesse, to be held in future ages for Iewes within the Realme, in steed of the honorable ranke which their progenitors had left them, and which their seruice done vnto his Maiestie should haue purchased them.

That it was more tollerable to liue vnder the truce of the deceased King, who was an enemy to their profession, yet he did grant vnto them the exercise of their Religion, both in his armie, and in his Court, allowed the Ministry at his owne charge, and gaue them a Towne of recreate in euery Bayliwike. With these and such like complaints, the King was daily importuned: the end of all these assemblies, was to obtaine an Edict from the King, so cleere and plaine, concerning all their necessities, as they should not be constrained to sue for any other: as they did not cease vntill the King had signed it the last yeare, being at Nantes, after that hee had reduced that Prouince vnto his obedience, containing a Declaration of the Edicts of Pacification, of the troubles growne in France for matter of Religion: the which was not established in the Court of Parliament at Paris, vntill the 25. of February this yeare 99. by reason of many oppositions and difficulties that were made. At Saint Germaine in Laye, Berthier, one of the Agents for the Clergie, made many petitions vnto his Maiestie, and did greatly importune the Lords of the Councell to consider of it. In like sort, the Bishop of Medena, who was then the Popes Nuncio in France, dealt in it, beseeching the King so to deale for his Subiects that were gone astray, as the honour of God might remaine whole, and the Church receiue no preiudice: In so doing, his Holinesse would endure all things for the peace of France.

Berthier demanded, that his Maiestie would not suffer the Ministers of the Reformed Religion, to haue any other libertie on this side the River of Loire, but to liue quietly, and not to bee sought after. That the Catholike religion should be generally restored in all places, and Churchmen doe their offices without any danger. And thirdly, that the Clergie men should be wholly freed from the vexations which they had suffered vntill that day, in Townes and Places held by them of the Religion, where they had taken away their Pensons and Reuenues, and in some Prouinces had forced them. His Maiestie granted the second and third Article: and as for the first, the King not being able to make any such prohibition without some trouble, it was let alone.

There was also great contention in particular, betwixt the said Berthier, and some of the Reformed Religion, touching the Assembly of their Synods: the which they would haue free, without demanding leaue from his Maiestie: maintaining that they might go freely into forraine Countries, and assist at their Synodes and other Actes: and in like sort receiue Strangers into theirs, the which the Marshall Bouillon had managed with some, who perhaps had not foreseene the danger: but Berthier contested it so vehemently against the Marshall in the Kings presence, as his reasons being heard, and the importance of the thing considered, that it was a meane to continue their Leagues and Intelligences with Strangers, to bee ready to take Armes at their pleasures, the which could not bee but with the ruine of the State: The King hauing heard by their Contestations, finding of what importance it was, hee presently caused that Article touching forraine Synodes, to bee razed: forbidding them expresse to go to any Assemblies, without his permission, vpon paine to be declared Traitors.

The Rector for the Vniuersitie of Paris, was also a tutor vnto his Maiesties Councell, that none of the Reformed Religion, nor their Schoole-masters and Tutors, might bee admitted into any Colledges of the Vniuersitie: but to bee excluded from all priuileges. Wherevpon there was great debate, especially for the Facultie of Physicke. But it was answered, that they should not bee admitted to teach, and and as for Humanitie and professions of Faculties, they should bee admitted as the rest.

And although the difficulties were great, and the conditions in some cases more beneficiall then in the first treaties of Peace: yet the common quiet of all France, beaten and almost ouerthrowne with the tragicke violence of Schismes and Diuisions, hath made all to be held Necessary that was Iust, and Iust wharsoeuer was Profitable. Although it were to be wished, that there were but one exercise of Religion, for that in this Vniue consists all Truth. But seeing the restauration of the Church is the worke of God, as well as the building of it, wee must bee content with that which may bee, and leaue the triumph and conquests of Soules, to his eternall Wisdom, who alone makes and frames the heart as he pleaseth, and giues the signe vnto so many Soules that are gone astray, to make them enter into saluation, being impossible for man to impose any necessitie to things which God hath left in Libertie, as the Conscience, the which should be as free in Estates as in our Thoughts.

The Church hath alwayes detested Heresies, but they neuer employed the rigour of their iudgements, but against the Arche Hereikes, and but when they had shewed themselves obstinate in their errors: their punishments were more Shamefull then Cruell, more Medicinall then Mortall, desiring rather to see their faces blush for shame, then redde with blood. Neuer Prince well aduised, did put his Subiects to death to force beleefe, destroyed his Prouinces by warre, to instruct their Consciences by the sword; knowing well that Religion is an acte of Vnion, of Concord and of Instruction, and VVarre is nothing but Sedition and Destruction. And those which in this world haue troubled both Heauen and Earth, to force their Subiects Consciences vnto one Religion, haue in the end beene constrained and forced, to suffer them to liue free and in rest, reiecting and refusing the aduise of those bad Physitians, who applyed nothing but Antimonic and letting of blood to all Diseases.

By these reasons, the King (in whose person God hath done so many Miracles, and powred forth a Sea of blessings) seeing that the continuance of the VVarre had produced no other fruites but the ruine of Iustice and Pietie, which be the two vertues which doe canonize Princes, the two Pillars vpon whose firmesse great clouis was assured of the continuance of this Estate, hee doth now confirme the Edict of Pacification of the troubles for matters of Religion, and willes that which hee may, least hee should incur the note of such as seeke to correct things that are incorrigible, and shew that the sore is greater then the remedy, that some things haue taken such deepe roote, as they cannot bee pulled vp. Time, Truth, and Reason haue prooued, that this Edict, was most Iust, most Necessary, and most Profitable. Yet the Court of Parliament could not allowe of this Fraternitie and Communication of Offices: saying, That they should not bee transported with the ambition of Honours, but content themselves with the tranquillitie of Conscience: that it is not conuenient in one estate, to haue great Offices executed by men of diuers Religions, being a thing vniust, to haue the New intreated, as well as the Ancient. They found a great difference betwixt this Edict and the Precedent, and refused to establish it. The King sent for the chiefe of them, and spake vnto them in this manner.

You see mee in my Cabinet, where I come to speake vnto you, not attired in any Royall ornaments, nor with Cloake or Rapier, as my Predecessors: nor as a Prince that comes from receiuing of Ambassadors: but apparelled like a Father of a Familie in his Dubler and Hose, to speake familiarly to his Children. That which I haue to say vnto you, is to desire you to establish the Edict which I haue granted to them of the Religion. That which I haue done, is for the good of the Peace. I haue made it without, I desire to settle it within my Realme. You ought to obey mee, if there were no consideration but my qualitie, and the bonde whereby all my Subiects are tyed vnto mee, and you especially of my Court of Parliament. I haue

If obedience was due to my Predecessors, there is as much or more deuotion due vnto me, who haue serled the State. God hath made choise of mee, to put mee in possession of the Realme, which is mine owne, both by succession and acquisition. The Iudges of my Parliament should not sitte in their seates but for mee. I will not bragge, but I dare boldly say, that I haue no example to imitate, but of my selfe. I know there haue beene factions in the Parliament: that they haue stirred vp seditious Preachers. But I will take good order for such people, and will not attend your pleasures.

In former times they haue punished them with great seueritie, that haue preached lesse seditiously then they doe now. It is the course they tooke to make the Barricadoes, and by degrees to murder the deceased King. I will cutte vp all these Factions by the rootes: and will shorten all them that shall nourish them. I haue leaped ouer Towne Walles, I will easily passe ouer Barricadoes. They should not obiekt vnto mee the Catholicke Religion, nor the respect of the Holy Sea. I know the durie which I owe, the one as the Most Christian King, and the Honour of the name which I carry, and the other as the first Sonne of the Church. Those which thinke themselves to bee in good termes with the Pope, are deceived. I am more then they. When I shall vndertake it, I will make you all to be declared Heretikes for disobeying of me.

The Maiestie of Kings is alwayes wronged by the contempt of their decrees: but the offence is alwayes greater, when it comes from them that should see them to bee obserued. Those which deny the execution of my Edicts, desire Warre. I will Proclaime it to morrow against them of the Religion: but I will not make it my selfe, I will send them. I haue made the Edict, I will haue it obserued, my will should serue for reason, the which is neuer demanded of the Prince in an obedient State. Their wills should bee put in execution, and not interpreted: And yet I say vnto you, that Necessitie and Profit hath drawne me vnto it. I haue done it by the aduice of all my Councell, who haue found it good and necessarie for the estate of my affaires, and the good of my seruice: to settle concord, and to disperse all the miseries which Discord doth bring forth. Some haue complained, that I would make leuies of Swisses, or of other troopes. If I did, they must thinke it were to some good end, by reason of all my actions past. Witnesse that which I haue done for the recouerie of Amiens, where I haue employed the money of the Edicts which you would not haue passed, if I had not come my selfe vnto the Parliament. Necessitie hath forced mee to make this Edict: by the same Necessitie I haue heretofore plaied the Souldiar.

They haue talked at their pleasures, and I haue not seemed to regarde it. I am now a King, and speake as a King, I will bee obeyed. There is not any one of you that findes mee not good, when hee hath need of me. And there is not any one but hath need once in the yeare, and yet you are bad to mee that am so good. If other Parliaments (for that they haue impugned my will,) haue beene the cause that they of the Religion haue demanded New things, I would not haue you the cause of other inuocations, by your refusall. In the yeare 1594. and 95. when I sent vnto you a Declaration vpon the Edict, for the prouision of Offices, I did then promise, that I would not aduance any one of the Religion, to Offices in the Court of Parliament. Since time hath altered the affaires, wee must accomodate our selues thereto: and yet I will bee well assured of such as I shall aduance to those Charges, that they shall gouerne themselves as they ought.

Talke not so much of the Catholike Religion. To all these great cryers, Catholickes and Ecclesiastickes, let mee giue to one a thousand Crownes a yeare in Benefices, to another foure thousand Liuieties of Rent, they will not speake a word more

A more. I haue the same opinion of all others that shall speake against the Edict. 1599

There are some which hate the sinne for feare of punishment, but the good hate it for the loue of Vertue. For Gods sake let mee know that you hate sinne for the loue of Vertue, or else I will chastice them that hate it for feare of paine: and afterwards they will thanke mee, as the Sonne doth his Father. The Preachers deliuer words in their Sermons, more to nourish, then to destroy sedition, yet no one of you sayeth any thing: these fautes which concerne n.e.e, are not regarded. But I will foresee that this Thunder shall bring no Storme, and that their predictions shall proue vaine. I will not vse their remedies, which being out of season, will but increase the euill. Consider that the Edict whereof I speake, is the deceased Kings Edict: it is also mine, for it was made with mee, and I do now confirme it.

I will say no more, but aduise you to imitate the example of the obedience of the Duke of Maine. Being perswaded to enter into some factions against my will, hee answered that hee was too much bound vnto mee, and so were all my subiects, amongst the which hee would bee alwayes one that should expose his life to please mee, for that I had restored France in despite of them that sought to ruine it. And if hee that was the head of the League, hath spoken in this manner, how much more ought you, whome I haue restored to the place from whence the League had expelled you, yeeld vnto my request, that which you would not do for threats? C You shall haue none of mee: do that which I commaund you, or rather what I intreat you, you shall not do it onely for mee, but for your selues, and for the good of the peace.

This speech was pleasing vnto the Parliament, & the difficulties which were found in the establishment of the Edict, were held tollerable, by reason of the Kings will, and the necessitie of his affaires. Yet they continued fortie dayes after, before they would resolue of it. The Duchesse of Barr, the Kings sister, would not depart out of Paris, before it was established. Shee had shewed her selfe burning in zeale and affection in that matter, as in all other affaires of that nature: and it was not without reason, that after the Kings entrie into Paris, when as the Deputies of the Churches of Posson beseeched his Maiestie for some thing depending vpon the execution of his Edicts: hee sayd vnto them, Adresse your selues vnto my Sister, your Estate is now fallen vnto the Distaffe. The articles of the Edict you may read at large in the Originals.

sues the establishment of the Edict.

The Edict was sent, by the care and diligence of the Kings Attourney general vnto all the Baylewikes depending vpon Paris: And yet his Maiestie had deputed in euerie Prouince, certaine Commissioners for the execution thereof.

The exercise of the Catholike Religion was restored in Rochelle, and in aboute a hundred walled Townes, and a thousand Parishes and Monasteries, where the sayd exercise had beene interdicted aboute fifteene yeares: and in Bearn for the space of one and thirtie yeares.

Whilest this Edict of pacification was established in France, Cardinall Andrew, for and in the name of the Archduchesse the Infanta, made one against the Hollanders, forbidding all her subiects to trafficke with them: The tenor of which Proclamation was this.

That since the beginning of the Ciuill warres vnto this day, many offers had beene made by her, and her Councell, to them of Holland, and their Associates, which were most reasonable, to reduce them to the dutie of their obedience, whereas they had rashly shaken off the yoke, and refused to vnite themselves to the other Belgicke Provinces, which did acknowledge and obey her: but seeing they could not preuaile by that means, they were forced to come to armes, in the which, notwithstanding the King her deceased father had vsed all clemencie and mildnes, hoping they would acknowledge their error, and craue pardon for their reuolt, & receiue the grace which hath beene often offered them.

That

1599. That for this cause he had granted them their navigations, fishing, and free trafficke A ,, with his obedient subiects, fearing that through this occasion the neighbours should ,, draw the profit of all negotiations to some other parts: the which the Hollanders know ,, well that the sayd neighbours haue laboured to do with all their power. But they were ,, so far from being reclaymed by these benefits, as contrariwise they grew more insolent,
 ,, and are growne obstinate, refusing in their Councells to resist the Peace, and to con,, tinue the War, the which proceeds not from the people (who of their owne dispo,, sitions loue peace, and desire to liue modestly in obedience) but from some new men, ,, who taking vpon them the authoritie to commaund, abuse the poore people in this ,, sort, regarding onely their owne priuat profit, and not the publike good: wherevpon
 ,, all conditions haue bene reiected by them, refusing to heare any Mediators for a B
 ,, peace: but desired warre, and to entertayne it, not only in Flanders, but through,, out all Europe: whilst that the Turke most cruelly inuades and vsurps all he can vpon
 ,, the Christians, imbracing the occasion whilst that Christian Princes are troubled ,, with the seditions of their subiects: and by this meanes, doth enlarge the limits of ,, his most cruell Empire. But aboue all, the sayd Hollanders haue of late done a great ,, and intollerable wrong, refusing to heare the Ambassadors sent vnto them from the ,, Emperour, and the Princes of Germanie: and yet the Emperour hath not forgotten
 ,, the desire he had to seeke a Peace, but hath sent a new Ambassage vnto them, ,, whereof the issue is yet vncertaine: and yet the sayd Hollanders omitt not to do all ,, kind of hostilities against their lawfull Princeesse, being growne proud by some hap- C ,, pie successe in their opinions, when as the Spaniards were buied in the warres of ,, France.

Moreouer a Peace being made with the French, they haue vsed all the poli,, cie they could, to hinder the Conclusion. And being required by the King ,, of France to inclyne to a peace, they haue not onely refused the treatie, but haue al,, so renewed the warre, by their meanes, who holding the Estate in their power, haue
 ,, no other care, but to thrust all the world into combustion. To them this inconue-
 ,, nience is to be imputed, if no fruite of peace hath bene imparted to any of the Belgick ,, Prouinces.

In former times they pretended for their excuse, that they could not giue care to D
 ,, any peace, whilst that Spaniards and strangers commaunded, of whome they would ,, not depend, for that they could not trust them. But the deceased King by his clemency
 ,, had taken from them this pretext, sending vnto them the Archdukes Ernest, and Al- ,, bert, whose care and singular desire, was only to imploy themselves for the publike
 ,, good: the which was knowne vnto all the world, for that either of them did labour
 ,, for a peace with great care and diligence, offering to be mediators for them, to reco,, uer their Princes fauour. Contrariwise they had contemned them, and would not vse
 ,, so great a benefit. So as the poore (people being oppressed with tyrannie, and reduced ,, to dispaire) contemne, or cannot comprehend the things which are for their quiet E
 ,, and tranquillitie: yea their Princes, whome the King had appointed for them, were con,, temned by them: whereas the States of other Prouinces had exhorted them to acknow,, ledge Her, returning her Ambassadors which shee had sent vnto them, not vouchsa,, fying Her any answer. The which may iustly bee held too vnworthie, for that all the ,, world wil so conceiue, that no man ought to haue society, nor confederation with them
 ,, which make warre against God, their Prince, and their Countie.

That vnto this day they haue had free libertie to trafficke: the which hath pro,, duced no other fruite, but to make them more bitter, for that they abuse the En,, tries, Excises, Imposts, and Customes, to imploy them for the mayntenance of ,, the Warre, whereof they haue rayed a great commoditie. And as for the Arch- F
 ,, ducheffe, shee hath imployed all meanes by her Councells, and with the intention ,, of the King her brother, to haue her Subiects liue in Peace, and submit themselves
 ,, vnto their duties.

Seeing then these people cannot be reclaymed by mildnesse, nor any benefits, shee

A as a Soueraigne Princeesse, by the aduice of her Councells, & namely of Cardinall An- drew, forbids all her subiects to haue any more trafficke or commerce with the said Hollanders and Felanders, and that nothing bee vented vnto them by her subiects, neither by Land nor Sea: directly reuoking all letters and papiers concerning the Nauigation and fishing, and also all other parrtents for negotiation, vntill within one moneth they resoluue to harken vnto a Peace. Which doing shee promisseth them all Clemency and Fauour, although they haue so often refused it vnto this daie.

This Edi&ct of the Infantaes was scarce proclaymed, when as the Estates made an othe contrary vnto it after this manner. That it is easie to see what the Spaniards pre-B tended, as well by this Edi&ct, as by the other stratagems of their Councells, which tends to no other ende, but to ouerthrowe all the liberty, not onely of Flanders, but of all other Nations, & will challenge vnto themselves a right and power, not onely ouer Bodies and Goods, but also vpon Soules and Consciences, wherevnto tended those great late enterprises, not onely by secret conspiracies and suborning of the subiects of France and England against their Princes, but also the Spaniards haue sought by maine armes, both by Land and Sea to inuade the sayd Realmes, whereof being frustrate, they haue attempted against the Princes of Germanie & the Electors of the holie Empire, to vexe them, taking their Townes and Castells, and spoyling their Countries, making all desolate, by Rapin, Rauishing and Murthers, without any respect of C sexe or quality of persons, hauing massacred Princes and Earles. And they threaten neuer to lay aside armes vntill they haue reduced all them to the ancient Ceremonies that were fallen from the Romish Church. So as they change Religion freely, and the administration of the Common-weale by force and violence in Emperiall Townes and Citties. Yea and they shewe by their proceeding, and publish it euery where, that they wish the Princes Electors and other Estates of the Empire would defend themselves by Warre, taking armes: so should they more comodiously effect what they pretended.

That in the same shop this present Councell hath bene forged, by the which the King of Spain hath forbidden all vse of trafficke, and hath vsed the Marchants and Mar-D riners most cruelly, whome they haue taken, seized vpon the Shippes, stolne the Goods and Marchandise that was in them, and violated his promises in diuers sortes. whereof the Infanta following his example, hath commanded the like should bee done in Flanders. It is for that they are greeued that wee haue expelled the tiranic which did hang ouer our heads, by meanes of vnion that is amongst vs, and by our Courage, Goods, Meanes and Forces, haue withstood their attemptes, and made frustrate their fraudes, relying chiefly vpon the fauour of God, and then being aided by the Queene of England and other Kings and Princes. The which we haue resol-ued to do, and to endeavor with all our powers, not onely to defend our limits from iniury, but also to reuenge the wrongs which haue bene done vs: not doubting but E God will assist our endeavors with his fauour, being so necessary: and inspire the hearts of Kings and Princes with this good intention, to provide for their affaires, and maintaine their Dignities against the wicked practises of them that seeke to supplant them.

In so doing, they hope vndoubtedly, that within short time the Spanish forces being expelled out of the limits of the Empire, and aboue all out of Flanders, a generall peace shalbe confirmed as it is most desired, with as great assurance as euer was. And for as much as to perfect this enterprize they thinke it verie necessary, that none should aide the Spaniards, nor their Adherents with Munition, Marchandise or Money: F they do strictly forbidde any of their Cittizens to carry any kinde of Marchandise whatsoeuer into any of the Prouinces which obeye the Spaniards or their complices. Also they forbidde all Fishermen and others that exercise all kinde of Marchandise by Sea, to take any passport or safecondu&ct from the Spaniards, wherewith they haue bene often heretofore intangled, and receiued losses. Also they mande, that not only all the Marchandise, Ships, Wagons and Horses of all such as shal bring any thing out of the Spaniards Countries, or shall carry vnto them shalbe confis-cate. But also they will that all Owners, Maisters of Ships & Wagoners shalbe punished by fine: and if after a yere they bee taken in any such offence, then to be corporally punished. But to the ende the nauigation may be assured for the Hollanders, and especially that they may be freed from excessive ranfomes which the enemy doth usually exact, they decree, that the Maisters of Shippes, and Marriners that shalbe taken by the enemies and ranfomed by them, whatsoever they haue bene taxed by them, they shalbe rembourfed and satisfied out of the goods of them of Brabant, Flanders and others that liue vnder the gouernment of Spaine, besides the ordinarie tributes and contributions, which the saied Brabanders and Flemings are accustomed to pay vnto them.

Whilest these Proclamations are published in the Lowe Countries, (the which shall bring nothing but a reuiuing of most cruell Warres betwixt the Flemings and the Hollanders) Albert the Arch-duke, and the Queene of Spaine, part from Milan, the 5. of February, to go to Genoa, where they imbarcked the 18. of the layd moneth. They passed by Savona and Nice, and anchored at Marselles, where as they were royally entertained by the Duke of Guise the Kings Lieutenant in Provence, and by his commandements. Yet the Queene went not into the City. From thence they parted the 22. of February, and laying along the coast of Spaine, in the end they came to the Port of Bi-rarras, in the Kingdome of Valentia, where as the Queene went to Land. From thence the Sonne of the Prince of Orange was sent to the Catholike King, to giue him intelligence of the Queenes happy voiage, and of her arrivall.

The last of March they came to Saint Mathiew, whereas the Marquis of Denia came in the Kings name to salute the Queene, & to acquaint her with his Maiesties private intentions. From thence they went and staid at Moluedro, a village of the remainder of Sagonte, an ancient Towne of the Romains Alliance. Here Albert the Archduke tooke post to go to kisse the Kings hands, and of the Infanta his spouse. From thence he went to Madrid, to see the Empreffe his Mother: where he continued foure daies, and so returned to Valentia. The King in the meane time, inflamed with an amorous desire to see his newe Spouse, disguised himselfe, and tooke vpon him the habit of a Nobleman, saying to be sent from the King to kisse the Queenes hands. But hee was knowne by the Princesses and Ladies that were then in the Queenes company: where he was receiued with incredible ioye and content of all men. In the meane time there were exceeding great preparations made in Valentia for the celebration of the marriage. The which being finished the 17. of April, the Queene made her royall entry, with so great and goodly an Assembly of Princes and Noblemen, that were come from all parts, and so gallantly followed, as it seemed an Armie, by the brauery of so Royall a traine. There were fise companies of men at armes marched before the troupe: then followed 30. Atabales or Drummes on Horse-backe, with Trompetts Clairons, and Hauboes, which filled the aire with their found. Then came the Cou-tiers without any prerogative of order or ranke. But especially there were 400. young Nobleme, like vnto Pages of honor Royally attired, euery one followed with his Pages and footemen, some fixe, some eight, others ten, some 20. 24. 26. and more, verie richly appareled in luyeries of all colours. There were moreover 700. Knights of honour in the Queenes Liury) white and redde, the ground satin. After them came foure Knights carrying the Royall Maces then the Stewards of the Queenes house, and sixteene of the Grandes of Spaine. Then came the Heralds in their coates of armes: After them marched the great Maiordomo or Lord Steward, and the Maister of the Horse: After all followed the Queene on Horse-backe, vnder a Canopie of Cloth of Gold, carried by 20. of the chiefe Noblemen of Valentia: the reines of her Bridle being of Silver and Gold, were held on either side by Noblemen of the Kingdome of Valentia.

Valentia. The Queenes Gowne was of Cloth of Gold, the gowne Silver, most richly imbrodered with Pearle and other precious stonnes. The Queenes Mother and the Arch-duke Albert followed with the Queenes Cabinet, with a great number of Princes and Noblemen: and last of all came the Princesses and Ladies in Carosses and Coaches. It is thought, that at this nuptiall pompe there was spent three Millions of Gold. The Queene having past the port, which was beautified with a triumphant Arch, she was led vnto the Church, which did glister, being hanged with cloth of Siluer. The great Alter was Royally furnished: before the which was an Oratory couered with Cloth of Gold, which might hold three persons: and another by it for fise. The Queene went thither, after shee had kist the Crosse, which was presented vnto her by the Patriarke Arch-bishop of Valentia.

The Catholike King being come downe with the Infanta his Sister, by a priuie way made of purpose, the Popes Nuncio (after the follenne Ceremonies were ended) did first kisse the King, and then the Arch-duke, if they did ratifie the marriages formerly contracted by their Ambassadors, and celebrated by the Holy father. When as ey-ther of them had declared that they ratified it, then altogether approached to the Altar, and vpon their knees assisted at the last blessing of their marriage. From thence they went to the Pallace, whereas the nuptiall feast was kept with the greatest state that might be. Two daies after the King made three Knights of the Golden Fleece, Albert the Arch-duke, the Admirall of Castille, and the Prince Doria. There were all kinds of sights and sports for the space of eight daies, in a Theater that was built of purpose, able to containe thre score thousand persons.

Knights of Fleece.

This yere Death strooke a great stroke among men and women, who shewed their generous resolutions against the feare and terrors thereof. Peter de Pinac the last of that name, Primat of France, Arch-bishop and Earle of Lion, died in the beginning of Ianuary: whose life was so famous, as it deserves to be breely set downe in this History. The reputation which hee had gotten at the Estates at Blois, made King Henry the 3. a great Prince, as well in iudging, as in recompensing of good wits, to call him to his Councell after the death of Monluc Bishop of Valentia: whereas hee shewed himselfe to be of that iudgement, as he was in short time employed in the greatest affaires in Councell. At that time the Court was in a manner all Gascon: there was no entrie into the Kings fauours nor liberality, but at the Duke of Espernons pleasure, who was the Ephesion of our Alexander. Peter de Pinacs heart could not subiect it selfe to that of John Lewis of Nogaret. He was too much his owne to be any other mans, and thought that if he must needs serue, it was inough to serue the Master, and not subiect himselfe to the will of the Seruant.

The death of
M. de Pinac Archbishop of Lion.

Hee did not affect the tedious seruitude of the Court, nor did not much care for that forced kinde of life. Writing vnto his friends, long before the trouble of these League, he sayd, that amidst the greatnesse and Honour of charges wherein the King did employe him, he did not leaue to desire the content of a happy retreat. But things fell out otherwise then he expected. The League burst forth in Champagne. The King sent him to pacifie the Duke of Guise. In this negotiation hee had a quarrell with Espernon vpon certaine words which blemished both their Honours. Hee had written a Poeme against the Mignons, wherewith the King was offended, commanding him to leaue the Court: so as hee retired himselfe to his owne house, after the treaty of Peace made at Nemours. But as the Kings blowes were but threats, so knowing well that this Prelate was not to liue idly in a corner of the Realme & that this great dessein of the League (like vnto a Ball of Snowe) did increase in manie Townes whereas the Kings obedience was growne cold, and that the Princes enemies to this Crowne prepared to gather the Flower de Luce, hee neuer ceased vntill hee had called him againe to Court.

Commanded to leaue the Court.

Called backe againe.

This returne was the beginning of his misery. Many others before him hauing fallen into disgrace with the Prince, haue not bene raised againe but for a greater fall.
It is seene in the Courts of all Princes, such Tragedies are vsuall.

Hee

1599 Hee was presently called to the Helme of affaires, and was followed and respected more then any other Nobleman in Court. But as wee may not iudge of the day by the morning, nor of the felicity of man by the good daies of his life, this happinesse was but the entry to misfortune which did attend him. Hee embarked himselfe in the same shippe with the Duke of Guise, the which being broken at the Estates of Blois, he had no other meanes to saue himselfe, but through the fauour of the Baron of La Roche Nephewe. He was giuen in ranfome to Gast, who kept him seauen or eight monethes in the Castell of Amboise, and then set him at liberty for thirty thousand Crownes. He went to the Duke of Maine, & seeing that the affaires of his party tended too much to confusion and to a popular government, hee perswaded him alwaies to retaine the forme of a Monarchie, to the end hee might oppose a kinde of Royaltie against the King, and not be blamed to haue broken the bonds of the Estate. So through this aduice, they made Officers of the Crowne, and gaue him the seals. Hee neuer ingaged him selfe vpon the promises of Spaine, but sayd alwaies, that hee was a true hearted Frenchman.

He was made keeper of the seals vnder the Cardinal of Bourbons whom they called Charles the 10.

Becomes at Lion vntill the Duke of Nemours.

He grows discontented to be no more employed.

The faction of Spaine knowing him to bee such, hindred Pope Sixtus the 5. from giuing him a Cardinalls hat, and they dissuaded Clement the 8. who had sayd that at the first promotion hee would remember his merits. He requited them well: when as the Spaniards came to Paris to propound the Coronation and Marriage of the Infanta Isabella of Spaine letting them know that the Flower de Luce could not pinne. He returned to Lion, leaving the Duke of Maienne, intending to settle his affaires, and to accommodate himselfe with the Peace and generall good of the Realme. At his returne grewe that tumult against the Duke of Nemours, the which he vsed ill, for his Wisedome did not second the occasion. Great vnderstanding failes sometimes in the perfection of Iudgement and Discourse. He saw himselfe forced to depart the City, and neuer to returne againe vntill the King made his first entry.

The King (who had shewed effects of his Bounty, and Clemency to his greatest enemies) could not loue him, hauing this impression in his soule, that he was the onely Instrument to crosse his fortunes. Speaking one day of the Peace of Nemours, in the year 1586. he sayd vnto him, that in that negotiation he had giuen good testimony that hee loued him not, and that hee had done him bad seruice. My Lege, answered he, I could not do better for the seruice of the King my Master. I had done otherwise, if I had bene your seruant, as I am now. When as the Duke of Espernon returning out of Provence, went to visit him at his Pallace, amongst other speeches of the remembrance of things past, he sayd vnto him, that hee did not thinke there was any one in France whose fortunes had bene so crosse as theirs: the Archebishop answered him, as for mine it was neuer crosse but by you.

After the reduction of the City of Lion to the Kings obedience, this great spirit, borne to action, grewe discontented to see himselfe no more in the honor and reuerence that he had bene. He then resolued to apply his minde onely to the affaires of his charge, to choose the time most conuenient for the tranquillity of the Hauens wherevnto he approached. When as the Duke of Nemours had made his escape out of Pierrefize, he said, that hee would not vie his liberty well: he writes vnto his friend in this manner.

Remember that I haue alwaies said vnto you, that Monsieur de Nemours will finde himselfe much intangled with the Spaniards, who haue led Monsieur de Maine into an inextricable Laborinth, & will bring Monsieur de Nemours vnto a miserable Estate: and I dare in a manner Prophecie, that in the end the Duke of Sauoy will finde himselfe deccied as well as the rest. The Spaniards Shirt is neerer vnto him then his Doublet, and he will rather seeke to preferue his owne, then to vsurpe another mans Estate for another.

The King sent for him to the Estates at Roan: but the necessity of his affaires would not suffer him to go. He sayd that he was not fit for this age, and that he was like vnto the Adamant, which serues not for all seas. In the end of his last year, he complained vnto 1599 vnto his friends of the shortnesse of his life, saying that hee was not to liue about ten or twelue yeares, when as hee liued not twelue dayes. His Physitions disagreed vpon the cause of his greefe: hee had bene long troubled with the Emoroyds, the which had so emptied his Bodie, as there was no bloud found in him when he was opened. His lights were much altered. And for that his Physition sayd vnto him, that his greefe was the Goute, hee replied. Is it possible that any one should die of the Goute without a feuer? I see well what it is: seeing men vnderstand nothing, wee must haue recourse vnto God. The third day of his sicknesse his Body was called to the Earth and his soule to Heauen.

He withstood the terrors of death with as great a courage as when it was presented vnto him at the Estates of Blois. Foure or fise houres before his decease a Capuchin came to visite him and to comfort him, exhorting him to free this last passage courageously, and to let him know that the issue of this life is equall, Death disrobing man of his titles and dignities, as Stage-players do their attire: hee called him simply by his name: when as he vnderstood this new manner of complement, & that they called him Peter de Pinac without any other ceremonie, hee lifted vp his head and eyes, to say vnto him that spake vnto him, what art thou? They found that this speech did somewhat amaze him, and that hee did take it as a watch-woorde of his departure, which was about midnight.

A Equat omnes in Paris m. Cambr. p. res m. Cambr. S. Epi. 92

The Duke of Biron did see him in his sicknesse and assisted at his funerall. No man lyuing did better iudge of the nature of men by the consideration of their visages: hee did diuine the Marshall Biron's fortune by his countenance, and the proportion of his visage, for hauing considered it some-what curiously, hee sayd vnto his Sister after his departure. Hee hath the worst Physiognomie that euer I obserued in my life, as of a man that would perish miserably. The Arch-bishoppe of Lion had profited so little by the troubles, as had hee liued longer, necessity had forced him to feele great dicommodities: his Sisters Estate was ingaged, the fruites of his benefices were seized on, and yet his table was as sumptuous, as in the best daies of his prosperitie. The League had cost him fifty thousand Crownes: the Doublons of Spaine had left him nothing but Doubles.

A Double is the first part of a Penie.

Those which haue red the publike actions of this Prelate may iudge of his Doctrine, but no man can represent the grace and force of his action but those which haue seene them. He had in him a concurrence of all things necessary for an eloquent discours. A graue pleasing countenance, a goodly personage, a facility of words, and an action that did charme his Auditors. The Duke Joyenze, Marshall of France, being at Paris in March, hauing heard Father Laurence sermons in Saint Germain L'Auxerrois, being moued in conscience, after that he had taken his leaue of the Ladies and some of his friends, he returned againe to the Capuchins: where being receiued by the Fathers, hee did a hard penance, and submitted himselfe to all the duties of a religious man. All men were amazed to see him returne the second time to his Couent, being plunged (in shewe) vnto cares in the delights of the world: but his Conscience tied him to returne by the bond of his vowe, perswading him that it were better not to vowe, then not to keepe a vowe made freely, and without constraint or impression in his maiorty.

The Duke Joyenze returns to the Capuchins.

The first motine of being a Capuchin came into his heart by inspiration, when as the deceased King Henry the 3. went on foote in procession to Chartres to haue issue, if it pleased God. He was then called Earle of Bouchages: hee made choise of this order among all others, the better to do his penance. And the rather, for that he vnderstood, that he was dedicated by his deceased Father, to be of the Church. When hee was first a Nouice, hee applied his studie with so great a courage, as he was blamed for his great diligence, wearing the haire continually. Hee had his shoulders all torne with woundes.

In this Estate hee continued vntill the hottest of the late miserable Varres: when as after the death of his Father, his yonger Brother, who was a Knight of Malta and 1599. Grand Prior of Languedoc was called Duke of Loyenze, (for the Duke of Loyenze, brother in Law to King Henry the 3. deceased, his eldest brother, who was slain at the battle of Conttras with S. Sannet his youngest brother, died without Child en) the said Duke of Loyenze being acknowledged by them of Tholouze, Narbonne and others of the League, for their head, he made an enterprise vpon the Towne of Villemer in Lauragais, where hauing planted the peege, for that it was held by the Royallists, such as hee thought to haue forced the Towne, the Lords of Themines, Chambaut and Misillac came to releue it, who charged him with such aduantage, as they put all his Army to route, so as the said Duke retyring to the passage of a river, he was drowned with many others. By this meane the house of Loyenze was reduced to the Cardinall of Loyenze his brother and to the Earle of Bouchage a Capuchin (whom then they called Father Angelo) The Tholousains and Nobility of their party being much amazed, had recourse vnto the Cardinall, whome they intreated often to take the charge of leading them: the which hee would neuer accept. And in the end, at their instant sute, that in rayfing his house, hee would succor them by the meanes of the Earle of Bouchages his brother, who was then more then capable of such a charge: but he was a Capuchin.

This difficulty was propounded to the Councill of the diuines, who concluded that by reason of the vrgent necessity they should withdrawe him from thence: the which was propounded vnto himselfe, and he refused it. But after they called before him the example of his owne Father, who being Grand Prior of Languedoc was yet dispensed withall to marry to raise his house, the which remained onely in him, and whereof God had approued his blessing by the effect, so many braue Noblemen being borne of that marriage, he consented to returne vnto the world, vpon two conditions. The one was, that it should be with the consent and leaue of the Generall of the Order. The other by the dispensation of the Holy Sea, and that he might returne againe when God should send rest to the Church and State. This obtained from the Pope & his Generall, father Angelo is againe of the world, & doth al acts of a Worldling; of a Captaine and of a Soldiar, applying himselfe to the humors of the time. After that hee had pacified many popular seditions in Tholouse, and became a meane to reduce it to the Kings obedience, being at Paris, hauing with the Kings good liking and pleasure married his only Daughter to the Duke Montpensier a Prince of the blood, he bethought himselfe of his bonde contained in his dispence, and went and yeelded his obedience vnto the Holy Sea & to his Order, whereas he is now one of the chiefe Conductors, hauing referred all his domesticall affaires to the Cardinall his brother, and to the Duke his Sonne in Lawe.

His Mothers teares preuailed much for his retaine. She was more afflicted for this change, then for the death of all her other Children, and neuer ceased vntill shee had drawne Frier Angelo (for so shee still called him) out of the deserts of Egypt, to Mount Caluaire, and that she had seene him in the habit which he had left. These be mighty effects of grace, which reformes that which is deformed, and conformes that which is reformed, confirms that which is conformed, transformes that which is confirmed, and makes the Soule to lue more in Heauen, whether it aspires, then in the body where it breathes. The King went to visit him, and commended his resolution, saying that he did sometimes thinke to speake vnto him of it, and had done it, but hee doubted that he would mistake his meaning, and thinke he did it to be rid of him. Dying one daie in a place where as there was onely his Maiesty and three other Noblemen, hee said vnto them, that in the world there were men of all conditions and qualities to be found, but they should hardly assemble foure so different, and that in the house, whereof he was one, there was a Sinner conuerted, A Leaguer repented, a Capuchin conuerted, and a Huguenot peruerted.

This amazement in Court for the Duke of Loyenze, was increased by the sodaine death of Schomberg, who was taken with an Apoplexie returning from Conflans, where as Villemer had feasted the King and all his Councill. It gaue him no respite to speake French nor Dutch.

This

A This yeare the Pope made nine Cardinals, for the second promotion of his Pontificat, among the which was Robert Bellarmine a Iesuite: which cauted many to murmure, being against the Institution of his Order, by the which all Iesuities are excluded from such like dignities, being forbidden, not onely to aspire vnto them, but also to hope for them, hauing taken a particular othe, neuer to seeke nor pretend any Dignitie nor Prelatship, directly or indirectly, neither in their companie, nor without, but by his commandement, who may command without reple, vpon paine of sinning, as it happened vnto Cardinall Toledo, and now to Bellarmin.

Waite dying, had left no quarrell in France, but for the Marquisate of Salusses, which the King demanded as depending vpon Dauphiné, and the Duke of Sauoy sought to vnto it vnto his house, from the which hee pretends the Dauphins had wrested it. The difference of this restitution must be determined by the Pope, who was named Arbitrator, by the treatie of Vernins. It is the most important sute that hath beene long time in Rome. The parties send their Ambassadors to Rome, to sue vnto the Arbitrator for iudgement. President Brulart goes for the King, and the Count d'Arconas for the Duke of Sauoy, and they come to Rome in the beginning of the yeare. In the meane time the Duke beseecheth his Maiestie, that hee will giue him leaue to visit him. The King answered the Duke, that he would gladly see him: but resolving to accompany his Sister when shee should go into Lorraine, hee should not make any long abode in any one place, during the rest of the Winter, and therefore hee desired him that hee would deferre his voyage vnto the Spring, thinking that he should not bee troubled to seeke him any farther, then in the Cittie of Lions, where he meant to bee about the same time. They pursue the Arbitrement at Rome: the Arbitrator (the best of good Popes) shewes as great Integrity, as the parties did Passion.

He was free from all affection that was contrary to Iustice, and would do nothing contrarie to his conscience. He was carefully instructed by either partie, concerning this controuersie. You may read the whole processe at large in the Originall. The Duke of Sauoy (hauing kept the Marquisate of Salusses some yeares, whilst that France had turned her owne armes against her selfe,) considered, that so soone as the King should ouercome his other affaires, the recouerie thereof would not be the last of his enterprises, for the restauration of that to his Crowne. Hee was therefore one of the first that sought to reconcile himselfe vnto the King: and the first propositions weremade by Sebastian Zamet. The King could hardly beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would separate himselfe from the desseignes and counsels of the King of Spaine, (who had alwayes a body of an armie in France) being so strictly tyed vnto him. Hee therefore sends to Syllery his Ambassador in Switzerland, to enter into conference vpon this matter with the Dukes Ambassadour there, and to sound his intention. The Duke had sent the Marquis of Aix into Spaine, to know how hee should treat with the King. At the same time they surprized a Pacquet comming from Spaine, the which being deciphered, they found the Duke desired to treat in good earnest: for his Ambassador writing from Madrid, sent him word, that touching the forme of the accord, for the which he desired to haue counsell, the King of Spaines Ministers would neuer tell it, but with many conditions, and secretly, although it were a thing which they desired, that they might retire their forces, and imploy them in Flanders, whereas all things went to wrack. That if his Highnesse, whom it did import, could finde the meanes to effect it, he was assured in the end they would finde it good, as they had done many other desseignes, reiected by them in the beginning, and afterwards allowed, according to the successe. Many conferences were made concerning this cause, before the Peace of Vernins, but nothing could bee concluded. His Holinesse being made Iudge and Arbitrator of all controuersies, betwixt his Maiestie and the Duke, the parties produce all their pretensions. The Ambassadour of France demanded restitution of the Possession, saying: That it ought to bee iudged before the Proprietie, and that the Possession of about a hundred yeares, should serue for a good title to France.

1599. if they had nothing else. The Dukes Ambassadour answered, That power may give possession without right, and that his Master had preserved his interest with the possession. After many difficulties and much dispute, the French men that were resident within Rome, gaue it out, that they had pleaded too much. that there was no reason the Pope should overthrow the right of a great King, to please a petty Prince: that they must end this quarrell with the Canon in the plaines of Piedmont. As these men braued it in words, the others published their reasons in writing, shewing that the rule of the Law, which will haue the dispossessed restored to his possession, is not practised among Princes, nor for Principalities. The French insist vpon the contrary, and vee an end of this businesse with great vehemencie, desiring rather to bee presently dispatched, then to languish in the tediousnesse of the remedie. The Spaniards delayed the decision of this processe all they could, holding the dispute more auailable to them then the Resolution, and the Disease more profitable then the cure.

the French.

The time appointed for the Arbitrement was almost spent in tedious difficulties, as vnpleasing vnto the Pope as to the French. And although hee had no lesse zeale to maintaine Concord, then he had shewed affection and care to suppress Discord, yet would hee gladly haue beene freed of this Iudgement, for the bad effects which hee did apprehend, and whereof the coniectures were easie by the consideration of things past. Hee desired not that the Iudgement which he should pronounce, should giue any cause to the one or the other, to complaine of his Iustice, being troubled what he should pronounce, for that it was a thing without example, and was dangerous to determine of that which had beene decided.

A Troop of officers
tion,

In these two extremes, either to iudge the possession of the Marquifate to the King, or to ioyne to the Petitorie to content the Duke: hee findes a meanes to haue the Marquifate sequestred into his hands as a Newter, to remaine in deposito, vntill it should be adiudged vnto the one or the other. To this end P. Bonauenture Calatagiron, Generall of the Friars, and newly made Patriarch of Constantinople, was sent into France with Roxas the Dukes Secretarie: vnto whom the King not onely granted (against the aduise of his Councell,) that the Marquifate should remaine in Deposito in the Popes power, as one who had no pretension nor title vnto it: but also a prolongation of the Arbitrement for two moneths. The Duke was well pleased, that this sequestration should maintaine the hope of his possession. The French desired rather a definitive sentence, then a sequestration, for although they had no cause to doubt of the Depositors fidelitie: yet through too much trust, men doe often fall into great inconueniences. The Kings Ambassadour freed them of those apprehensions, and managed this Sequestration so politike, as they found it in better estate, then the Kings Councell did expect. Hee caried himselfe herein like a man of great Iudgement, neither could hee serue his Maister meanly, in a subiect of so great import. The Duke grew in some Icalousie of Arconas, for that he was a Milanais, becoming that hee did rather follow the Spaniards intentions, then his: wherevpon hee called him back to Turin, vnder colour to send him into Spain. Hee that succeeded Arconas in that charge, married all, receiving the Instructions that were giuen him too lightly, and deliuering them too indifferently, for visiting the Cardinals, which he thought did fauour the intentions of the King of Spain, and the Duke his Maister, hee drew nothing from them, but that the issue of this businesse would not bee as hee expected. The rest of the Cardinals which had other desseignes, blamed the Dukes Councell, who had ingaged him in the expectation of a iudgement both doubtfull and of small honour: that the best hee could hope for, was the hatred of a great Prince, who would alwayes remember this iniurie: and that they had caused him to plead so long for his owne. The French vsed other subtilties, to make him counsell the Duke to breake off the Arbitrement. And for that this ingagement in an others hands, was not pleasing vnto them, they held it little for the reputation of France, to follow such tedious formes by way of Iustice, seeing there was a more speedie course by the way of Armes.

They

A They gaue it out, that the Depositarie would hold things in that Estate, as when it pleased him he would make it knowne, that the thing engaged belonged vnto him: that he had good correspondencie with the King, and that his intention was to make one of his Nephews Marquis of Salusses, and Feudatarie of France. This feare, or rather indiscretion of the Ambassadour, imbarqued him so farre in this Icalousie, as he holds the Iudge for suspect, and sends to his Maister, that he should dislike of the Depositarie, as much as the King. And although the Popes intention was not to be corrupted, yet he beleueed it to be true by the Popes coldnesse, and he did not onely beleuee it, but thinking it a basenesse to dissemble it, and treason not to speake it, hee told the Pope, That his Maisters Highnesse did expect an assured Iudgement from his Holynesse, to be maintained in possession of the Marquifate, as a thing which he held of his Predecessors, wherof he had been spoiled by the violence of the stronger, & had recovered it by the good hap of an occasion. The Pope said vnto him, that he desired not to leaue these two Princes long in this dispute, nor to breake the course of happinesse which their subiects promised themselves by the continuance of the Peace. But the Ambassadour, who was transported, added: That if his Holinesse gaue sentence in fauour of his Maister, he should dispose of the thing adiudged, and finde him as full of affection as any other, to second his intentions, when it should please him to haue the Marquifate for one of his Nephews. The Pope who marcht vprightly, being offended at an offer so contrary to the integritie of his intention, sayd vnto the Ambassadour, that he neuer had any such thought, and to free him from all feare, he would desist from the Iudgement, and deale no more neither with the Arbitrement nor Sequestration.

Indiscretion
contounds and troubles
it telle.

All men thought at Rome, that the Arbitrement was broken, and the consent for the Sequestration reuoked: the French cared not, and the Duke was content that things should passe by other formes then those of the Consistorie. The Ambassadour of Spain at Rome would not haue the Duke of Sauoy doe his businesse alone, nor the controuersie for the Marquifate of Salusses, to remaine at his disposition: the King his Maister was interested therein, it was reasonable he should be the first Mouer of all his motions. He therefore intreated the Pope, not to leaue things imperfect, and not to refuse to end a worke so happily begun for the generall good of all Christendom, greatly interested in the Concord of two Kings, who could not long continue, if all occasions of Warre, that might growe vpon this question for the Marquifate of Salusses, were not taken away. The Duke had already found in many occasions, that the Councils of Spain were not alwaies put in execution to his content: that he fastned his Hopes to a rotten Cable, trusting to their resolutions: and that their deceits (though couered with goodly shews of Loue and affection) were so much the more odious vnto him, for that he which deceiues vnder the name of friendship, is more to be blamed, then he that is deceived. He therefore propounded to doe his businesse without them, and from many great discontents, hee tooke a resolution to go into France: so as from that time hee neuer slept quietly, vntill hee were assured of the Kings word.

She also considering, that whatsoeuer is done by Men, may be vndone by them againe: that Princes fauours are inconstant, and that humane things haue nothing firme nor constant, no more then the Sea; shee willingly gaue care to the promises which hee made her for the good of her hopes. He could not haue found a better Sollicitor: but death tooke her away. Shee parted from Fonsbleau in the beginning of the weeke before Easter, to come to Paris, and there to passe the Feasts. The Diuiners, whom Idlenesse and Curiosity entertaines commonlie at the Court, sayd, That a Child should hinder her from attaining to that wherevnto shee did aspire. she tooke her leaue of the King: at her departure, as if she had bene assured neuer to see him more, recommending her Children vnto him, the finishing of her House at Montcaux, and the Rewarding of her Seruants. This recommendation of her Children did chiefly concerne the Duke of Vendosme, whom she loued dearly, and whom she intended to bring vp in the most perfect institution of Vertue.

Duchesse of Bourbon.

Being at Paris, shee went on the Wednesday to S. Anthonies Church to heare the Musick, where shee was seized with extreame paines, which neuer left her vntill that life had left her. They killed the Infant in her, and tormented her with such cruell conuulsions, as they drew her mouth to the nape of her neck. Shee was first lodged at Zamers house, neere Saint Anthonies gate: but being fallen into this extremitie, shee was carried to the lodging of Madame de Sourdis her Ante, in the Cloister of Saint B Germain l'Auxerrois, where on the Saturday shee ended her life. Vpon the first aduertisement of her sicknesse, the King went from Fountainbleau to see her. The Marshall d'Ornano met him, and beseeched him to returne, for that sight could not prolong the life of the sicke, and would but increase his grieue. Presently after arriued Belieue, who brought the newes of her death, into whose Carosse the King went, to euaporate more at ease his sighes, the which hope of recouerie had somewhat restrained. Words are not able to charme such sensible blowes: and it is an error to thinke, that griefe is driuen away by exorcismes, that it regardes words, or is stayed by discourse. Yet this first violence of the Kings affliction, was calmed by the wise and graue admonitions of this Nesler, who said, that France had acknowledged him for her Hercules, and as hee had bene like vnto him in many labours equally glorious and admirable, so now hee should bee vnlike him, in that he did abandon the Argonautes, for the griefe he had for the death of Hylas, whom he loued.

This death did much trouble the Count, for the sorrow and lamentation which the King made for her. Her beautie and good behauiour had moued the King to loue her, for the long absence of Queene Marguerite, (whose place she was in hope to possesse absolutely) She left him three Children: Cesar Monsieur Duke of Vendosme: Alexander Monsieur, who was named Earle of Armagnac, & at this time is appointed Grand Prior of France: and one Daughter. She was more lamented of private persons, then of the publike, who found her hopes more insupportable then her carriage. She offended few, and bound many vnto her. A great Personage sayd: That she was of such an humour, that seeing the King must needs loue, he could not loue an obiekt, whose loue would be lesse preiudiciall to himselfe, nor to his people, so as shee continued in the first condition of her birth.

The little Fort of Chamouisset was taken by
in July 1597.

The Duke of Sauoy was much grieued for her death. But as Domesticall afflictions, which chance to Princes, although they bee separated from the publike, are not lesse feeling and violent; his griefe to see his affaires so crost on all sides, was augmented by the Death of D. Phillipin his Bastard Brother, whom Creguy slue in combat. It is a great paine to purchase Honour, a greater to preserve it, but greatest of all: to recouer it when it is lost. Speaking of Honour, I meane the reputation of goodly and vertuous actions, whereof Honour is the recompence, and the sweetest nourishment. Of those things which do blemish the lustre of Honour, the first and most base is, to speake or do any thing for feare of death. The second is, to endure and suffer a word of Contempt, Iniurie, or Affront. The third is a Lye. This rigorous obseruation of the point of Honour, doth now countenance a Combate, as memorable for the condition of the persons, the forme and circumstance of the combat, and the cause of the quarrell, as any other of this age. Quarrels haue not alwayes reasonable grounds: this had nothing but despight, which D. Phillipin had conceived, being told him that Creguy had wanted he had gotten his Scarfe, at the taking of the little Fort, built by the Duke of Sauoy, neere vnto Chamouisset, to fauour the passage of his armie. D. Phillipin some moneths after, thinking that this was spoken to the preiudice of his Honor, sent him a challenge. Creguy comes to the place appointed by the appeale: but the appellat was kept back by the Dukes commandement.

The

A The Earle of Brandix, who seemed also to haue desired to fight, sent word to D. Margueres General of the army, that if he had any mind to see the Combat betwixt D. Phillipin and Creguy his sonne in Law, hee should not returne without his part of the sport, but hee should find one to exchange a thrust with him. Hereupon Creguy was taken prisoner going to succour Charbonniers. During his imprisonment, the quarrell grew to that point, as if hee had bene at libertie it had bene then ended at Turin. After that the treatie of peace had sent him home into Daulphiné, D. Phillipin sent to challenge him at Grenoble, and they met neere vnto the fort of Barrault, where the appellant was thrust through the thigh. This combat, which had bene sufficient to haue ended this quarrell, was the cause of another, for it was told the Duke, that Creguy had wanted that hee had of the blood of Sauoy. Wherewith hee was offended, and gaue D. Phillipin to vnderstand, that he would esteeme him no more, as he had done, nor euer see him more, if he were not reuenged of those words. Whereupon another challenge was sent, the which was accepted as cheerefully as the first.

The prohibition which the King had made of single combats, vppon paines not onely preiudiciall to their Estates, but shamefull to their reputations, would not suffer them to fight in Daulphiné, that the example of the Gouvernours Soame in Law should not draw others to the contempt of the Law. It was therefore resolued, that they should fight in the Duke of Sauoyes Countrie, vnder Saint Andrew, a place belonging vnto the Countesse of Antremont, vpon the banke of the riuer of Rhosne, on foot, and in their shirts, which is the most couragious kind of Combat. That they should fight with rapier and dagger: That the Baron of Attignac should second D. Phillipin, and la Buisse should second Creguy. That none but they should come into the field, and they should not part the Combaters vntill that one of their deaths had ended the Combate. That there should be twelue Gentlemen on Daulphiné side, and as many on that of Sauoy, who should be ready to receiue the body of the vanquished, or to resist any violence that should be offered vnto the victor. That the twelue of Sauoy, should bee so farre from the place of Combat, as they of Daulphiné might passe the water, and come at the same instant to the place of fight. It was long disputed whether the Seconds should fight: for la Buisse sayd, that he would not be one, vnles he might giue or take, and that he which goes in such occasions to be a simple Spectator, wants affectio or courage. But the Combaters thought it good that the Seconds should not medle with the decision of their fortunes.

The day appointed being come, all came vnto the place. De Merges passed the Rhosne, and scoured vp and downe the fields, to see if there were no ambush nor greater assemblie then was set downe in the Accord. The Seconds visited the armies of the two Champiōs, & searched them, if they had any Charmes or Inchantments about them. La Buisse did importune D. Phillipin much to part, saying that he had a desire either to driue it off til night, or to deferre the tryal vntil the next day. He tolde D. Phillipin by the way, al the braueries he could of Creguyes valour, to the end he might appalle him: and seeing Creguy a farre off in the meadow, he cryed vnto him, he is ours: but Phillippin carrying an Eye without trouble, and a Heart without feare, sayd vnto him: why haue you so bad an opinion of mee: Not so, replied La Buisse, I know you are braue and Generous, but you haue to do with one of the most furious men at armes in France, and that makes me to foretell your losse.

La Buisse forgot nothing in this action, that might shew the office of a friend. And it is well knowne, that if Creguy had not returned, La Buisse would haue stayed to haue slaine D. Phillipin and D. Attignac, or to haue bene slaine by them. Du Belier his Brother, knowing his humor, and that he had too much Courage and Honour, to returne without his Friend, was vpon the banke of Rhosne, attending the issue of the Combat, meaning to passe through the riuer on horseback, and to haue had his part of the Glory or Perill of this action. When as D. Phillipin entred the field, he had his iudgement so cleere, as obseruing his enemies gard, and the aduantage which he had, turning his backe to the Sunne, he sayd, Monsieur de la Buisse, diuide the Sun: and seeking himselfe

This first fury did but thrust Creygy out of the Meadow, and Philippin out of Breath. Creygy being resolved to thrust, not according unto the judgement of Choller, but of occasion, attended with this fury were past, thrusting him into the body with such force as he overthrew him and nayled him to the ground. He sent a post to forbid them to fight, but he arriued two houres to late. Creygy thanked God for his victory, and would not suffer his friends to vse their accustomed congratulations, intreating the to speake no more of it, although the glory were great, to haue vanquished his enemy in a Forraine Country. *D. The Estate of the Kings affaires in Swisse.

The Princes of the house of Austria defeated by the Swisses.

As the Kings enemies at Rome labored that he could haue no reason of the Marquis of Salusses, to there wanted no practises to trouble his affaires in Swisse land. It is a long time since the King of Spaine discovered his ieaousie for the general alliance of the Crowne of France with the thirteene Cantons, hauing long practised to haue his share. Our Kings hauing alwaies hindred it, hee could neuer get any footing there, as King of Spaine, but he hath had an hereditary alliance for the reuenues of the house of Austria. So in the raigne of King Charles the 9. when as the King of Spaine demanded to be receiued into alliance, Belienre Ambassador of France seeing the Catholike Cantons almost perswaded to prefer new Amities before ancient, laied before the great sucors they had receiued of the Crowne of France for the setting of their liberty: whereas contrarywise the house of Austria had done all they could to suppress them. That they should bee wary, not to truit in the alliance of a House offended, in the which the wound did yet bleede by the death of three Princes defeated by their Armes. That hee was not ignorant, that the King of Spaine, as descended from the house of Austria, had hereditary desseins vpon them, by reason whereof the greatnesse and prosperitie of his affaires should be suspect vnto them: for as we ought neuer to feare nor suspect the prosperitie of Friends, so must wee alwaies doubt that of Enemies. These admonitions were of such force, as for that time the Ambassadors of Spaine returned as they came.

The petty Catholike Cantons allied to Spaine.

But since the troubles of the last Ciuill Warre in France, the King found himselfe charged with so many affaires within the Realme, as hee could not possibly prouide for all abroad. His owne Subiects did so trouble him as he could not answer the hopes of his Allies. This was a goodly occasion for the King of Spaine to worke his will with the Swisses, and to winne the game, seeing that no man plaied against him. And as mercenary friendship vanisheth, when as Money failes, the French Crownes appeering no more in Swisse, the enemy caused his Ducates to bee disperfed among the petty Cantons, so as they choaked all the first seedes of the Flower de Luce. Then might you see in France, Swisses against Swisses, and Cantons against Cantons, the one shewing their duties vnto the King as his Allies, the other armed against his seruice, as hirelings to the King of Spaine. When as they see that they were not paid their Pensions, and that their Captaines and Colonels receiued nothing of that which was due vnto them, the five petty Cantons tied themselves more straightly to the King of Spaine, and Colonell Pstister, who had great credit among them, taught them, not to cast their eyes but vpon the Sunne which riseth at the Indies: The greater Cantons continued still firme in the Kings friendship. The wisdom of Brulart shewed it selfe in this bad season, as good Pilots are best known in the greatest Tempests: for hee entertained the Kings seruice beyond all hope, in the greatest of his troubles, when as the King had for a Scepter his Lance, for his Louure a Tent, & for his credit Hope & the lawful right of a Kingdom. It may iustly be sayd, that he did great seruice to France in this charge, & the wisest haue wōdred how he could maintaine the affectiōs of this people, when they were entertained only with the words of his witedō, & how he could so long continue this hope amidst the cōmon despair of the affaires of France. But when as the Swisses did see that al France was reduced vnder the Kings obediēce, their Patience was turned into cōplaints, & they gaue it out, that if they had not effects for words wherewith they had bene fed so long as they saw the King could giue them nothing else, they had courage enough to come & demand it themselves. During the seige of Amiens, there was a Captaine of one of the petty Cantons, who seeking to make his profit of the time and of the extremity of the Kings affaires, propounded a bold Councell to get their pay. The Realme was yet so full of treachery, the King so ill serued of part of his Subiects, the forces of Spaine so great and so farre entred into France, as if they had done what he propounded, or Cesar had not sent them backe with so good a composition as in former times, he had done what he could to giue them money. The Count of Parliament had cōfirmed certaine Edicts, the profit whereof was appointed to content them as that of reunion of the Registers to the Reuenues, that of the sealing of Lether, & Companies of Handy-crafts men. Whilest that the Captaines and Colonells labored for the execution, the Ambassador entertained the rest with good words and great hopes, which serues much to temper the impiercy of the most violent, and the languishing wearines of attendants. Hee imparted vnto them the Kings Councells for the reestablishment of his affaires, and the paiement of that which was due vnto them.

Monseigneur Morsmontaine.

The King sent them Money. But as there was not so much as they expected, and that the greatest part was appointed for such as had serued in the last occasions: so it did but increase their discontents and complaints of the rest, so as in the beginning of this Year, Morsmontaine the Kings Ambassador left his charge to come into France. Such as thought to make their profit of this retreat, gaue it out, that it was forced: but it was freely of himselfe, who thought it expedient for the Kings affaires to make offer of this voyage, and to charge himselfe with their demands: but the Swisses staied not long to demand his returne, after the which he died and was sollemnely buried at Soleurre in a rich Tombe. After the sollemnising of the King of Spaine's marriage at Valencia, he went with his Queene to Valladolid, where he hath settled his Court (imitating the example of Charles 5. his Grand-father) & not at Madrid, which since the death of Philip the second is growne desert. This Prince, after his marriage gaue himselfe wholly to the exercise of Peace, & left the conduct of affaires to his Councel, seperating himselfe in a manner fro the view of all the great men of Spaine, but only of the Marquis of Denia, whom hee made Duke of Lemos or Lerma. The Grandes of Spaine not able to endure this vnequall distribution of the Kings fauors vpon one only obiect, & being greeued that this common sunne hath no light but for two eyes, they make great complaints, and the more for that his wife was preferred to be the chiefe Lady of Honor vnto the Queene, wherewith the greatest house in Spaine had bin much honored. This discontent was shewed in all the sorts the Malcontents could deuise. The Images, at the Kings coming to the Crowne, & at his entry into Madrid, did speake. They made the Image of Iupiter carrying a globe of the World vpon his shoulders, and discharging one moetic vpon King Philip, with an inscription shewing that the Empire was diuided betwixt Iupiter & Cæsar: there were found these words written in an vnknowne hand vnder Iupiter's Image: This is the Duke of Lerma. The King coming one day from walking, found vpon his table a letter sealed with this superscription. To King Philip, the third of that name, King of Spaine, being at this present seruant to the Duke of Lerma. The King vnderstood al this and laughed at it, saying to the Duke of Lerma, See what they say of us. There was a Tragedy made at Valladolid, the speakers were, the King, the Cōstable of Castille, the Duke of Lemos and the People.

The

1599. The argument was, the Complaint and Insolencies of the Duke of Lerna. The Catastrophe was the death of the Duke, torne in peeces by the furie of the People. A letter going betwixt the King and the Duke of Lerna, thrust the Duke in such sort, as he made him stagger. saying, Stand fast, for if thou fallest, thou wilt neuer rise againe. The King taking these words as spoken against him, answered presently, Wee will both fall then. Great men which had laughed at the Bouffons speech, were amazed at the Kings answere. All Spain admires his Fortune the most Happie thinke, that they must be borne vnder the same planet that will be Happie. But no man can say how long this happines will continue: for in the end, the great and vnmeasurable fauours of Princes are Preiudiciall and Ruinous to their Favourites. Courtiers burne themselves therein like Butterflies. But they are wise that thinke of these fauours, as the Dogges do of the water of Nilus, in passing and running, least they be deuoured of the Crocodiles, of Enuie and Iealousie.

Assemblee of the Deputies of some Princes of the Empire at Conflans.

The Circles of Germanie.

The Insufficiencies of the vniued Prouinces.

We haue sayd before, that the Assembly of Collen was referred to Conflans (which the Germanis call Coblentz) the eight of March. Thither came the Deputies of the five superiour Circles, to consult of the meanes whereby they might defend and maintaine the liberties of Germanie, and suppress the insolencie of the Spaniard, who attempted in hostile manner vpon all Estates. This word of Circle, according to the Germanis Custome and Phrase, signifies properly a Canton of the Countrie: but it is taken for the Alliance and League, which certaine Princes and Imperiall Townes haue one with another. And of these Circles, there are five superiour, that is to say of high Germanie, and the five Inferior are those of Low Germanie: and it is one of the causes for the which the Allemands are called Germanis, for that their Countrie doth all equally belong vnto Soueraigne Lords, according to their titles: one a Duke, another an Earle, a third a Marquis: And as for the free Townes, they be such as haue redeemed themselves from their Lords, & haue obtained the Lords Fee vnto themselves: (as they of Metz, who redeemed their Liberties frō Godefrey of Bullen, going to the conquest of the holy Land) The five Inferior Circles, are Westphalia, which is vnder the Iurisdiction of the Prince Elector of Collen, Hamborough, Lubeck, Vtrecht, and East Phrise, with the Countries adioyning: and vnder them are comprehended the Hans Townes, which be 72. in number, the which haue very great Priuileges. Those of the vpper Circles D were such as assembled then at Conflans: the first is Mayence or Mentz, Treues, Collen, and the Palatinat, which makes one Circle. The second is Brandebourg, Wirtzbourg, Henneberg, Hohenlo, and Noremberg. The third is Wormes, Simmer, Heise, Nassau: for the fourth is Munster, Tuilliers, Paderborne, Lippe: & for the fift, Magdebourg, Brunswike, Mekelbourg, and Mulhous. These haue an Alliance together, and it is lawfull for them to assemble when they please. Being thus assembled, all the Propositions formerly made vnto the Assembly at Collen, by Rodowitz Commissioner for the Admiral, were againe vewed and considered of, with the iustifications of the States of the vniued Prouinces, which were these in effect.

That they had receiued letters from the Princes Electors, and others of Germanie, E containing the complaints of the Estates of the Circle of Westphalia, vpon the oppressi- ons and outrages, which the Countries of Cleues and Tuilliers, of Collen, and Westphalia did suffer by the men of warre of either partie: whereby they were required to retire their men presently out off the territories of the Empire, to restore the Townes which they held, raze the Forts which they had built, and to leaue the Countrie, Townes, and States of the Empire in their ancient Peace, Rest, and Quiet: wherupon their answer & resolution was also required. For answer whereunto, the sayd Estates declared, that they were forie to heare such complaints, and the more for that they were put in the same ranke with the Spaniards and Admirall, who had not forborne to Besiege, Batter, Force and Take Townes, Castels, Fortresses and Gentlemens houses in the Countrie of Cleues and others of the Circle of Westphalia, by Murthers, Burning, Spoile, and Rauishing of Wiues and Mayds, without any respect of Estate, Qualitie, or Condition: And yet not content therewith, they had by their garrisons and threats forced

A forced some of the sayd Townes (besides their Ransomes and concussions.) to change the Religion and Gouernment, which they haue many yeares inioyed vnder the authority of your Excellencies, and of other Princes, whereas the King of Spain had no interest, nor could with any reason colour his attempts. And contrariwise, for their part (sayd the States) no thing had beene done but by extreame constraint and necessitie, (the which hath no Law) for the Preferuation, Maintenance, and Assurance of their vniued Prouinces: and the which according to the Law of armes and custome of warre may be done without any contradiction: whereunto they had beene forced. By reason whereof, they did beseech their Excellencies, and all men of Iudgement in matters of warre, if considering the Admirals attempts (seeing they had no other meanes to make head against the enimie, but in preventing him, and occupying of those places which he himselfe would haue taken) they haue first seized on them, and put in men, seeing that the Talhuis which they had seized on, was not sufficient to resist the Admirals forces, who would not haue failed to come thither (whereas the Inhabitants should haue bene treated with the same mildnes that he hath vsed in other places) thereby to haue had an entrie into their vniued Prouinces. Besides, they neuer had any intention to usurpe one foot of ground belonging to the Empire, nor of any Prince or neutral Lord, to hold it in Proprietie, as they sayd they had of late assured his Imperiall Maestie, and the Princes of the Empire, and namely the Prince Elector of Collen, with whome they desired nothing more, then to entertaine a good Alliance, Amitie, Correspondencie, and good Neighbourhood, maintayning themselves in that sort, without diminution of their Estate, vntil they might once see an end, whereunto they did alwaies tend and aspire euen vnto this houre. The which they haue made sufficiently knowne by their resolution to restore Rhinberg vnto the sayd Prince Elector of Collen, to hold it vnder the rights of neutralitie: if it had not bin prevented by the seige which the Enemy layd before it: whereby hee would haue given some colour to his attempts, with such as through ignorance or impatiencie haue not founded the ground of the matter. The which attempts are manifest, by the surprises of Townes and places, and change of Religion and Gouernment: whereby he did not onely aduertise Princes and Lords, but plainly teach them, how he meanes to intreat them and their Subiects, at his first opportunity to settle the Spanish Monarchie. They had seene by experience how willingly and freely (sayd the States) they had the last yeere, at the request of the sayd Princes and States of the Empire, deliuered vp diuers places which they had wrested out of the enemies hands, lying within the lymits of the Empire, vpon hope that the enemies would also yeeld what they held depending of the Empire, as they had promised to the sayd Princes and States: which deliuerie vp by them, and refusall of the enimie, hath beene so preiudiciall vnto them, as in the end they haue beene constrained to besiege and forseth the Townes of Alpen, Mauers and Berck, according to the good successe which they haue had. It is also manifest how they restored the Townes of Alpen and Mauers, without restitution of one penie for the charges of the Conquest: and how they had offered to do as much for the Towne of Berck, with a declaration of the true meanes to entertaine the lymits of the Empire in Peace, if the enimie (who sought the contrary) had not hindred it. Which their good and sincere intention hath beene so much the more manifested, for that according to the order set downe by Prince Maurice their Captaine, to expell the enemies garrisons out of the Towne of Emericke, they did it, & restored the sayd Towne vnto the right Prince, whereby your Excellencies and other Princes may see the sincerity of our actions, without any farther doubt or distrust.

But rather that you would seeke the meanes whereby the Spaniards and their adherents may be chased out of Germanie, and their pretended Monarchie prevented, to the end that the members and Subiects of the Empire may be freed from so great dangers & troubles, for the effecting wherof (said the States) we haue these many years done our best endeouours, & mind so to continue, trusting that God will moue the hearts of Kings, Princes, Potentates, Commonweals, & States, to effect & embrace their comon defence, rising al jointly to quench this fire. So beseeching their Excellencies to take &c. These iustifications being conferred by the Deputies with them of the Admiral, they acquainted of the Deputies of Westphalia &c.

That it would please the Princes Electors to consider with what care and diligence the Emperour had sent his commaundement and letters, as well to Albert the Archduke, as to Andrew the Cardinall, who were not yet well aduertised how things had past.

That to leuie an armie onely vpon the territories of the Empire, they must take good aduice, and that by a Diet or Generall Assembly of all the Estates of the Empire. That the Spaniards and States had mightie armies, and their souldiars had beene hardened and practised in armes for these thirtie yeares.

That both the King of Spain, and the said States, hauing had warre with other Kings B and Princes, and their armies defeated, they haue presently renewed the warres, and with greater forces.

That for many reasons he would not aduise them to take armes presently, but to stay a time, and in the meane while, they should require both the one, and the other againe, to repaire the hurt done by them in the Emperours Countrie, by some friendly composition, and that in the meantime, the Emperour should call an Imperiall Diet, where if it should be resolu'd to leuie an armie, to chase as well the Spaniards, as the States out off the territories of the Empire: that the Emperour as the soueraigne head should consent thereunto, and do any thing that was befitting his charge.

Contrariwise, the Deputies of Westphalia, of base Saxony and of the vpper part of the Rhine, did shew, that they could not attend to any other time to resist the Spaniards, and the Admirall, who contrary to the promises made by them, to restore the places taken, did still rauage more and more, ouer the Countreies of Westphalia, Cleues, Mark and Bergh. That Albert the Archduke, and Andrew the Cardinall had beene aduertised of the violence of their armies, and that they must resolute to repell force by force. Whereupon it was decreed by the consent of the greatest part, in forme of an Imperiall Edi&: That they should giue necessarie succors to the Circle of Westphalia, and to the other Estates of the Empire that were besieged.

made at the Assembly of Constance.

According vnto this Decree, Henry Iules Duke of Brunswike and of Lunebourg, Poßulus of Halberstat, and Prince Maurice Landgrane of Hesse, leuied good troupes of m'n, D with that which the States of the aboue named Circles did ad vnto them, all which together made a good bodie of an armie of Germanes, of ten thousand foote, and three thousand horse, whereof Simon de Lippe was Capitaine Generall, the Earle of Hohenlooe commaunded the Duke of Brunswike troupes, and Count George Euerard of Solms those of the Landgrane of Hesse. And for Generall of the Artillerie, they had Oliuer de Timpel Lord of Cruybeke.

Count of Lippe pe Generall of Germane armie.

This armie being on foote, the Spaniards left their lodging about the end of Aprill, in the quarters of Westphalia and Munster, the which they had made very desolate, and came and planted themselves along the Rhine about the Townes of Emeric and Rees: And afterwards, as the sayd armie approached, hauing stayed to beseege the fort of Walsom, right against the Towne of Rhinberk, vpon the riuers side, which the Germanes did take in the end, they continued almost two moneths vnprofitably in that quarter, and neuer aduanced, to the great discontentment of the said Princes of Brunswike, and Hesse, and of their Lieutenants. In the end the Count of Lippe marching downe the Rhine on the same side, the Admirall of Arragon retired his Spaniards out off Emeric the 7. of May: remouing his bridge which he had vpon the Rhine, and placing it lower before the Towne of Rees. After he had wel manned the said Towne with a good garnison, he passed the greatest part of his army, and hauing cast a bridge ouer the Meuse, hee entred into the Ile of Bommel, betwixt Rossum and Driel, intrenching themselves, and making a fort vpon the banke of the riuier.

The Germanes

The Germane armie being come lower, hauing the Towne of Emeric at their deuotion (being abandoned by the Admirall) the Earle of Lippe beseege the Towne of Rees, being litle, and of small defence, and vnworthie to stay such an Armie: in the which

A which, besides the discontent of the Commanders, many things wanted from the beginning. This sodain and v unexpected coming downe of the Spaniards into the Ile of Bommel, did wonderfully amaze them of the Towne, and many of the Inhabitants retired themselves with what they could carrie away. Whereof Prince Maurice being aduertised, he flies thither with part of his Horse and Foot, whereby he assured them of the Towne. for without doubt, if the Admirall had marched directly vnto the Towne as soone as hee entred into the Island (it lying all open on the one side, by reason of the workes at the Rampiers and Bulwarks) he had taken it. At the Admiralls arrival into that quarter of Bommel along the Meuse, hee beseege the fort of Crenetour, whereas Capitaine Spronke commanded for the States, who after hee had indured the battery & an assault, in the end he yeilded by composition to depart with armes & baggage. The Admirall makes his approaches to the Towne of Bommel, and beseege it a far off. Prince Maurice (to hinder his neerer approach) did cast vp a trench without the Towne, fro one side of the riuier to the other, in the which he lodged good troopes of foot. Yet the Spaniard approached neerer, and brought his Canon to batter the Towne at random, as he did, where among others, Murrey Colonell of the Scots was slaine vpon the rampar, with a Canon. And as Prince Maurice his army was part in the Towne, part in the Trenches, and one part vpon the other banke, ioyning to the riuier of Waball, he was forced to make a Bridge of Boates before the Towne, to go from one quarter to another. The Spaniard, to annoy this Bridge, planted some peeces vpo the riuier side, to batter it in flanke, annoying them that past to and fro very much. In the meane time the beseege (who were not beseege but of one side, hauing the Riuier and their Bridge alwayes free) had their reuenge, being daily in skirmishe with the Spaniards, who were in the end forced to leaue their approaches, and to retire farther off, and in the end quite to abandon their trenches neere the Towne.

Whilest that the Count Lippe was at the seege of Rees, and the Admirall and Prince Maurice in the Ile of Bommel, the Deputies of the Circles of the Empire being anew assembled in the Towne, writ vnto the States the eighteenth of Iune, making the like complaints against their horsemen, being in the suburbs of Emden, as against the Spaniard. Which letters were answered by the States, who in the end sett their Ambassadors to the Earle of Lippe, Generall of the army, to treat vpon certaine points, but especially vpon the reparatiō of damages done vpo the territories of the Empire.

The like letters of complaint were written by the Generall and the Imperiall Deputies, vnto the Commanders of the Spanish army, and vpon the same points of reparation of damages, and restitution of places held by them, free trafficke vpon the Rhine, and caution that there should be no more such oppressions committed by them: whereupon the Spaniards made many euasions. In the meane time the sayd Generall approached with his armie neerer vnto Rhees. Doctor Dyenburch was sent by the Spaniards the 16. of August, vnto the sayd Generall and Imperiall Deputies. At his arrival he proclaimed publicly the reparation of damages, and the charge hee had to deliuer Rees: but the next day he denied all, saying that he had no authoritie, and praying them to giue him 3. dayes respite to aduertise his Maisters, yet after much dispute, (threatning to ioine the forces of the Empire with the States army) they granted him 3. daies.

At that time the Emperour sent Maximilian the Archduke his Brother, to pacifie the troubles, and to cause the Spaniard to retire out off the limits of the Empire. He came to the Count Palatin, and to the Duke of Wirttemberg to that end: but the States had a litle before yeilded vp Tolhuis and Sewenter, with some other forts therabouts: and the Spaniards had also giuen vp the Towne of Genep. In the end (being threatned to ioine the Germane army with that of the States) the Spaniard consented to yeeld the places which he had taken, & to retire his army out of the Lymits of the Empire. The which he did, and the States also, vpon condition that the places which they should restore, should be hereafter so well kept by their right Lords, as the Spaniards should not enter any more by the Emperours Countrie, to make warre against the Hollanders, nor the Hollanders against the Spaniards: which done, the Germane army (the which of it selfe was ruined for want of money) was discharged.

The Arch-dukes passage into Flanders.

The Archduke having conducted the Queene into Spain, receiued the Infanta his Wife to returne into Flanders, to take possession of the Lowe Countries, which the King had giuen her for her Dowry. Having taken their leaue of the King, Queene, and Empresse his Mother, they parted frō Barcelona, & came within 18. daies to Genoa, from thence they went to Pavia, and so to Milan, whether the Pope sent Cardinall Dietrich to visit them, & to giue in his Holiness name, a Sword vnto the Archduke, & a Rose of gold vnto the Infanta, which are the Popes ordinary presents vnto Princes. Then they past on through the Grisons & Suisses, and the Countries of Elzas and Lorraine, whereas the Duke receiued and feasted them with great pompe. In the end of August the States of Brabant sent their Deputies to Niuelle, to offer them their homage and seruice. They made some stay at Hale, whither the Cardinall of Austria came, to giue an account of B his charge: and from thence they entred in Bruxelles, where they were receiued with more stately shewes then King Philip had beene in former time. But no Towne of Flanders may compare with that which was done at their entrie into Antwerp, when as they were declared Marquises of the holy Empire.

They spent the rest of the year in visiting the other Townes of Flanders, and for that the trade of Marchandise is more vsed there then in any Prouince of Europe, in all Townes of their obedience, they did confirme the Imunities and Freedoms of Marchants, forbidding to lay any new imposition vpon the marchandise, remembring well that as the auarice of the Duke of Alua, in the imposition of the tenth penny vpon all marchandise, had made all the Prouinces reuolt, so it was reasonable to augment their liberties: for the Prince which seekes to enrich his subiects, cannot be poore wile they are rich. They did hope that the Infanta, Daughter to a Princeesse, whom Europe called, The Queene of Peace, should be the Doue to bring the Oliue branch, in signe that these great Deluges of blood should cease: but she declared presently, that she could not yeeld vnto a Peace & liberty of Conscience. In all other things they do acknowledge her a Generous Princeesse, full of Pietie and Clemencie.

Let vs leaue their Highnesses in their Councils at warre, and returne into France, to see how the King doth husband the Peace. He employes all his thoughts for the profit of his subiects, to restore them to those commodities whereof war had deprived them. And therefore considering that a great multitude of his people remained vnprouitable, for that they were not imploied in trades and occupations most necessary for traffick: for that the work which should be made within the realme by Frenchmen, were brought and sold by Strangers, namely Silkes, and Cloth of Gold and Siluer: he did therefore forbid by an Edi&th, the entrie into his Realme of all Stufes made of Silke, Gold or Siluer, pure or mixt, vpon paine of confiscation: to the end the French might be imploied in the making of all those marchandises, which were forbidden to be brought in.

As the Marchants of Tours did solicit these Prohibitions, so they of Lions made great sute to hinder it. They alleged, that prohibiting the entrie of Marchandise made by hand, they must of necessity be made in France, the which being well planted, would yeeld sufficient comodity to nourish 500000. Frenchmen, & the Gold & Siluer, which goes out of the realme in specie, in great abundance, should continue there stil. Those of Lions did shew, that this prohibitio made the King to loose halfe his custome at Lions: that it would ruine the Faïres, & this ruine would draw after it the ruine of the City, the which had bin built for the comerce and traffick of all Europe, and was neuer seene more flourishing then since the strangers frequented it, by meanes wherof, it did for a time so abound with money, as our Kings haue found great succours in the necessity of their affaires, and sometimes were indebted 6. or 7. Millions of Gold, as well to the Inhabitants, as to Marchant strangers. That the whole State was interested into her preservation, being one of the Bulwarkes of the weakest part, & lying open to enterprises of his enemies. That many Strangers, being ready since the Peace, to come and make their Banke at Lions, were held back vpo the brute of the prohibition of strange wares, & if the City should continue disinhabited of Marchants of that quality, it would be dangerous to leaue it in the hands of poore Artisans, who are insolent in time of peace,

The decealed King would haue done it; and it was found reasonable by his Councell, but in the end, time let them know, that it was no time to vse such prohibitions, & that before they hinder the entrie of forraigne stufes made of Silke, they must haue wherewithall to make it within the Realme. bidden of the entrie of Silkes

This year there was a notable Imposture, which ministred matter of discourse to the Kings Councell, to Preachers in their Pulpits, and to the Court of Parliament. A young maide of Romorantin, named Martha Brosier, hauing curiously read over the discourse of the Diuel of Laon, she was so transported with the imagination of that which she read, as imitating the motions of her folly, she seemed to haue the Fits & Passions of one that were possessed with the Diuel, although nothing be so hard to counterfeit as the Diuell. James Brosier her Father, a man of himselfe busie and factious, desirous of new things, hauing obserued in his Daughter furious motions, with such a stupidity and feare, as it did moue commiseration and amazement in the most resolute, & feare in the weaker, hee seemed to beleuee that which hee would haue the people beleuee, who came running to see this new Diuell, publishing euery where, that his Daughter was posselt with an euill Spirit. He presented her to the Theologall of Orleans, who be-lieued some thing: & seeing that his desseigne grew into credite, he led her to the most famous places of all the Diocesse for deuotion: to all the people beleued certainly that she was posselt, the which must be verified by the Iudgement of the Church. But the Bishop of Angiers, a graue and a wise man, discovered her to be a counterfeite, and sent her away, threatening to punish her, if she returned into his Diocesse. The Official of Orleans did also finde out her imposture, forbidding the Clergie of the Diocesse to Exorcise her, vpon paine of Suspension. After that she had run 15. moneths vp and downe the Country, & being growne perfect in her counterfeit tricks & Deuillish motions, her Father thinking she knew enough, & that it was now time to present her vpo the great Theater of France, he conducts her to Paris, and leads her to all the Churches to gather almes. The people crie out presently to haue the Diuell conured, holding an impiety to suffer one of Gods Creatures to bee so tyrannically tormented by a Diuell. The Bishop assembles the learnedst Diuines and Pastors of the Vniuersity of Paris, to haue their aduise about the conuring of this Diuell: the Physitions say, that she lieth, that it was but counterfeite. A Capuchin grieued to see the incredule of the French in such motions, said with some passion. If any one beleuee not: if he will but see her, the Diuell will carry him away. Marescot fearing not be carried away by this kind of Diuell, answered, that he would abide the hazard: & setting his knee vpo Martha, & his hand to her neck, he commanded her to be quiet, wher vpo she stired not, saying that her Diuell was gone.

The Court of Parliament seeing that all the people did run after Martha, satisfied with that superstition (which goes before, & is alwayes the beginner of impiety) should diuide their opinions and affections, and cause some dangerous sedition, they commanded that Martha should be deliuered into the hands of the Lieutenant Criminal. The Clergie said, that those that were posselt, did not belong vnto the temporall iudic. But on, and that the Church had power to Iudge thereof. Yet she is committed to prison. They haue recourse vnto the King, who commands that the Parliament be obeyed. So as by a Decree of the great Chamber, and the Tournelle, the Lieutenant of the shire Roabe was inioyned to conduct Martha with her Sisters, & James Brosier her Father to Romorantin, forbidding her to depart out of the Towne, without leaue from the Iudge of the place. And so the Diuell was condemned by a sentence.

An other Diuell posselt the soule of a miserable wretch, who made an execrable attempt against the Kings person. A Capuchin of Milan, called father Honorio, gaue intelligence thereof, and the party that was described in his letter, was found, & apprehended at Paris. The King did thanke this good religious man by expresse Letters, and did

1599 witness by his Ambassador resident at Rome, that he would preferue the remembrance of so good a turne, to make it knowne vnto all his Order, that he had bound him vnto him. God would not call a Prince so necessary for the Earth, so soone into Heauen, before he had fetled his people in that rest which their long paines & calamities had deserved. It was the Kings onely care to settle euery thing in his order, with the aduise of the Princes of his house, and the Lords of his Councell. They found that the subjects could not fully enioy the benefit of the Peace, nor be eased of their charges, so long as the Crowne was indebted, and that that which should serue to maintain his Royall Estate, was not sufficient to pay the Rents & Pensions, which amounted to two Millions of Gold: the fees of Officers came to 18000. Crownes, & many other charges, which were not discharged for lesse. This extreame necessitie, made them to seeke out many Rights and Duties belonging vnto the Crowne, the which had beene morgaged and aliened during the last troubles, which suffered all that could not be amended.

This was most apparent in Languedoc, whether the King sent De Maiffe, one of his Councell of State, and Refuge a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris. And although it be a hard thing to draw a multitude compounded of Mutinies & Factions vnto reason, yet through their perswasions, the Countie did grant vnto the King the sum of two hundred thousand Crownes, to be paid in foure yeares, with an increase of the Gabelle or Custome vpon Salt vnto two Crownes, which came to fifty thousand Crownes a yeare at the least, more then the King received. So as the assured succours from that part, increased the Kings treasure 150. thousand Crownes yearly. But it increased much more by the continuance of the imposition of a Soult vpon the Liure, the onely remedy to supply the Kings affaires, the ground whereof is necessary, which makes that seeme iust which is profitable to the Common-weale. The Commissioners appointed to establish this Leuie of a Soult vpon the pound French, were not receiued without opposition, nor executed without murmuring, vsuall in such inouations. There was no towne which found not it selfe ouer-burthened, to shew that they were not able to beare any more. This body was growne so weake with this long disease, as euery little thing, how light soeuer, did seeme to oppresse it. But they complained not alone of this Imposition: other Subsidies were the cause of more ordinary greouances, & grounded vpon more reason. Traffick is one of the Elements of a Realme: when that ceaseth the subiect feelles it presently: nothing hath so much hurt it, as the augmentation of Customes and Imposts, nothing hath made it so contemptible, as the couetousnesse of such as had the charge to gather it, and no man hath more felt the discomoditie of it then the Marchants of Lions who complained chiefly, for that they had erected a new Custome house in the Towne of Vienne, which staied all marchandise that came out of the Leuant. These complaints were so common, and so often reiterated to the Gouernor of Lions, as he thought it good to send some one, when as the 12. Townes in Dauphiné should assemble their Estates, to intreat them to take away this Custome, which made the Marchants to keepe from Lions, least they should come neere vnto these Gallies. The Deputy made an excellent speech vnto the States of the Prouince assembled at Grenoble, as you may read at large in the Original. This discourse full of reason & truth, had not the power to make them of Dauphiné redresse the complaints of Lions, but only to beteech his Maiestie to moderate the cause. His affaires would not suffer him to giue that ease, which Iustice and his Maiesties clemencie desired.

Whilst that the Commissioners trauell throughout the Prouinces, about the executiō of the Kings Edicts, as well for the good of the Peace, as to supply the necessity of his Exchequer, he passed the greatest heat of Summer at Blois. There the King of Spain gave him to vnderstand by his Ambassador, that hee had great reason to complaine of the French, especially of the Lord La Noue, who against the conditions of the Treatie of Vervins, were gone to serue Count Maurice, & the States of the Low Countries, & if the publick faith did not maintaine these reciprocal bonds, the Peace would be more inuiolent then war, being impossible to auoide the deceits of hostility, of him who shew himselfe a friend, & is an enemy in effect. The King hauing protested, that his intention was to haue the contents of the treaty truly obserued, he commanded La Noue & all his subjects,

A subjects, to returne home, within six weekes, vpon paine of losse of life, forbidding all others to go thither vpon the like penaltie. The Archdukes sent the Prince of Orange to visite the King, and to giue him intelligence of their arriual into the Lowe Countries: and Andrew the Cardinall hauing resigned vp his charge, takes his way through France, to see the King.

About this time, the yeare granted for the Arbitrement of the Marquisate of Salusses was expired, with the prolongation of threemoneths: yet would not the King attempt any thing, but commanded his seruants onely to stand vpon their gardes, whilst that he approached neerer to the Duke of Sauoy, to know what he would say. The brute notwithstanding of an armie which the King of Spain had caused to imbarke in Portugall, staied his voyage, vntill he might see what way it would take. But this great Armie which had no reputation but a farre off, and was not knowne by reason of the distance, proued in the end but fise Vessels, the which were incountred by the States, and beaten neere vnto Dunkerke. Nothing did hinder the Kings exercises and sports at Blois and Males-herbes, where hee spent his time with the Marquis of Vernueil in the meane time his good seruants watched both within and without the Realme, for the good of his affaires: all laboured in diuers actions, but with one will, and to one end, to make the State as flourishing as it had beene, and the Maiestie of the Prince to be respected, as it is, Sacred and Holy.

Out of this number of good Seruants & Officers of the Crowne, death tooke away Philippe de Hurault, Earle of Chiurny, and Chancellor of France. He had beene at the first Controulour of King Henry the 3. house, being Duke of Aniou, and King of Poland, and by him made keeper of the Seales, in the life of the Cardinall of Birague, and after his death Chancellor, and by him dismissed to his house at the States of Blois, when as the Seales were giuen to Montheleu Aduocate in the Court of Parliament. In this change he made triall, that Princes Officers are in his hands, as Counters be in an Auditors, who raifeth them to the greatest and highest number, and fodenly brings them downe to the lowest. And although it be not spoken why the King commanded him to retire, yet as soone as they saw him disgraced, the friends of his fortune, and the seruants of his fauours abandoned him. He continued a while like an old cast ship which lyes in the harbrough and serues to no vse. Hee returned to his charge, and serued the King stoutly, in the most troublesome and dangerous time of his affaires. Afterwards he had many crosses. There were so great complaints exhibited against him in the Assembly at Roan, as he was in danger to haue lost the keeping of the Seales, or not to haue a Cardinals Hat, demanded of the Pope for him. Hee did not affect the second, and the first hee preuented, considering that they could not take away any thing, nor diminish his great Dignities, but with Shame and Disgrace.

Pomponne de Belieure succeeded him after his death: he restored the Seales (the sacred instruments of Soueraigne Iustice) to their honour. All corrupt practises which made friends to the prejudice of the Common-weale were banished. There is no other fauour then that of Iustice, no other expedition but in publike, and by order. Nothing is settled extraordinarily but by the Kings expresse commandement; or for the good of his seruice, which may not bee deferred vnto the Sealing day, and that in the view of all the Officers of the Chancerie. Nothing is presented which hath not bene examined and held iust by the Maisters of Requests that were present. The King, hauing receiued newes of the Chancellors death, he commanded Villeroi to dispatch his Letters before he demanded the place: which done he presented himselfe to take his oth betwixt his Maiesties hands, kneeling vpon a Cushion of Velvet, the which the Chancellor and Constable onely doe, and no other Officers of the Crowne. His Maiestie would not binde him, but to doe what hee had alwayes done, for the good of his seruice, and of his Crowne. To conclude, hee was not preferred to this high dignitie before any one that exceeded him in ranke of seruice, or in merit and experience, hauing vndergone the chiefe charges within the realme, and happily performed abroad important and weighty Ambassages for the King.

1579. About this time John de Schomberg, Archbishop and Elector of Treves dyed, and in his place was chosen Lothaire, of the noble family of the Meternits, a man of great experience, and singular learning, and above all, a great lover of peace and quietnesse, a worthie vertue in Princes and Prelats.

This yeare also tooke away some Princesses in France: amongst others Mademoiselle the only daughter of the Prince of Condé, the which hee had by his first Wife the Princess of Nevers and Marquis of Lisle. Her obsequies were made at Saint Germain des Prez with great shew, as it was fit for a Princess of the blood. Loise de Budos, the Constables wife died also (a little before the Duchesse of Beaufort) having left one Sonne and one Daughter, whereby the famous house of Montmorency is renewed, the which was like to fall to the Distaffe. The Marquis of Belle-Ile (widow to the Marquis B the eldest Son to the Duke & Marshall of Raiz, a younger daughter of the house of Longueville, having passed five yeares of her widowhood, & brought vp her Son in all vertue and pietie,) departed secretly out of Brittanie, not aduertising any one of her kindred, and went to professe her selfe a Nunne, in the Monasterie of the Feuillantes at Tholouse. Her Brother and her Husbonds brethren posted after to diuert her, but she was already in the Couent, and resolved to end her dayes there. A generous resolution of a Ladie, issued from that noble house of Longueville, which holds one of the first places in France: It is Soueraigne of the Countie of Neuchastel in Suisse, and allied to the house of Bourbon in diuers branches.

Execution of the Edict of Pacification.

The Commissioners which were employed for the execution of the Edict of pacification, found some difficulties in those places, whereas the Bishops and Pastors of the Catholike Church, had neither Temple nor place of retreat: yet the Masse was restored to those places where it had bene banished fiftene or twentie yeares; and the Preaching appointed onely in those places that were allowed by the Edict. They found in all places rough and violent Spirits, very hard to be dealt withall, which inuented vaine quarrels, when as they wanted iust cause of complaint. The Commissioners exhort either partie as well to Concord as to Pietie, and alwayes to containe their wills within the bounds of Obedience, and not of Rebellion, and to forget the factious names of Papists and Huguenots, the which haue bene no lesse fatall to France, then those of Guelphes and Gibellins in Italie. They aduised the Preachers to take heed that their discourses were not streames of sedition, as they are sometimes of Eloquence, for they that make profession to teach the word of God, may do as much harme in fauouring a Sedition, as they shall gather profit of his Ministerie when hee shall preach Peace. The Commissioners did admonish the Magistrates and cheefe of Justice, to prevent the first motiues of sedition: which getting credit with the simple, is the cause of great disorders.

Warre ruins both State and Religion.

So the Edict was executed throughout the realme, and the most sauage began to stie louingly together, burying the remembrance of things past. Things done cannot be recalled. We must grow wise hereafter by the consideration of what is past: we must haue our eyes open, to distinguish the causes from the pretexts, and discouer the euill which is hidden vnder a shew of good, holding alwaies for an infallible Maxime, that there is no iust occasion to arme against his Prince, nor to trouble the quiet of his Countrie: We haue bene so abused, as we haue taken the Maske for the Face, Selander for Innocencie, and Falshod for Truth, and vnder these false impressions, we haue lein an assured Peace for a doubtfull. We haue beleeued those Emperiks of State, who desirous to continue our languishing, and to prolong our diseases, haue from that Principle of Truth, that Ciuill warre ruins both Estate and religion, drawne this proposition: That France cannot liue in peace with two Religions. The which hath cost the liues of those that haue maintayned it, and the ruine of others that haue beleeued it.

Being then reconciled for that which is past, and well aduised hereafter, hauing escaped shipwrecke against our owne hope, let vs remaine in the port of this concord,

A concord, where the King doth guide vs, after so many stormes and tempests, wee shall be there assured. The Sea doth no harme to Shippes that haue good Anchors: Obedience is the Anchor which doth assure our Shippe, against the furie of winde and waues. It is that which giues life and motion to all the members of the body: and there is not a more certaine signe of the life of an Estate, then Obedience. It is the eye of the body, which liues last and dyes first: it should bee the heart, which liues first and dyes last.

Obedience the eye and heart of an Estate.

This yeare the Princess Antoinette, Daughter to the Duke of Lorraine, was conducted by the Earle of Vaudemont her brother, to the Duke of Tuilliers, who had married her: there was attended with a goodly traine, and came to Colen, where she was honourably receiued by the Senate: and after some dayes, she went downe the Riuer to Duisfeldorp. The Nuptiall ioy was great and stately, although it were somewhat disturbed by the infolencie of the armies, as well of the States, as of the Admirall. The marriage of Sibille Sister to the Duke of Tuilliers, and of the Marquis of Bourgondie, brother to Andrew of Austria the Cardinall, caused a peace in the Countrie of Clenes, Lorraine, and all the Spanish pretensions went to smoake.

The Duke of Tuilliers marries the daughter of the Duke of Clenes, Lorraine.

When as after the death of the Duchesse of Beaufort, they saw the King falling into a new shipwreck, from the which hee was lately escaped, and that loue (mourning, yet for his first Venus) lead him to another, you might heare the sighes of the most modest, the murmuring of the most turbulent, and generally, presages of some approaching storme. This was the onely spotte of Oyle, which did pierce through the glorious actions of this Prince: who superiour to all other in Courage and Valour, and alwayes equall to himselfe, made himselfe subiect to this Passion. Truth will not suffer me to suppress that which cannot be hid. It is good to conceale that which is doubtfull in his actions that hath no other Iudge but God: but to keepe secret that which is knowne and seene of all men, is a basenesse. It imports to know things truly, which not being written, shall passe to posteritie according to their passions, which shall begin and continue the tradition. Ancient Histories (as full of simple Truth, as voide of Affectation) haue not concealed the loues of Princes, whose vertues they haue written. Of all the follies of men, there is none more excusable, nor of the which fewer do excuse themselves, then of Loue. All fight vnder this banner. If then it was necessarie for the King to loue, he could not loue any thing more worthy of his loue. But when as Death did see that the Louer grew blind in the thing he loued, and that this blindness had brought France into confused darknesse, he separated them.

Vpon this consideration, the Court of Parliament finding, that there is nothing that doth more preserve France from falling into forepassed miseries, or more assure the present, and continue their prosperities hereafter, then the Kings issue: therefore they beseeched his Maiestie to marry, and to giue to himselfe a Sonne and a Successor to his Realme, there being no armie more powerfull, either by Sea or Land, to assure an Empire, then many Children. La Guesle the Kings Attorney general, made the speech. He represented vnto his Maiestie, how much he was bound vnto God. He discovered the publick diseases of his estate: shewed the remedies: and in the end he let him see, that the enioying of all the felicities which peate purchased by his victorious armes, could promise him, was weakly grounded: France was not assured to see it durable, the which depended on the lawfull birth of a Daulphin.

The Court of Parliament perswades the King to marry

That although by the lawe of State (a sacred and immutable Law, and an originary and fundamentall Law of the Crowne) the succession belongs to the neereft Kinsman, yet France is too full of those turbulent spirits, which in the calme of Peace, watch carefully for occasions of warre. which in the midst of rest, breath after troubles: and freed from the perill of armes, hold still (like madde men) their Hearts and their Courages armed, to moue new contentions an other day against the Lawe and order of the Realme: whereof the King himselfe had made such tryall of their bad intentions, as without the vertue of Heauen infused into him, his Right had bene vanquished by Force.

That the shining of the Sonne is pleasing, as a calme Sea, or the Earth covered with his greene tapistrie. But there is nothing so goodly nor so delightful to the Eye, as the sight of Children newly borne in a family that wanted this aduantage. That to attaine vnto this happines, they must begin by the dissolution of the marriage betwixt his Maiestie and the Queene, Duchesse of Valois, being no lesse easie then that of Charles magne with Irmengrade, and Theodor a Daughter, & Sister to Didier King of Lombards; for indisposition and sterilitie of Lewis the 7. with Elenor Duchesse of Guienne for some discontentments set downe in the Historie, and covered with the pretext of Constancy, guinitie, of Lewis the 12. with Jane of France daughter to King Lewis the xi. contrayned by force, and want of consent.

That they should not be troubled to seeke lawfull causes of this dissolution, for besides the want of issue, in the which consists the second end of Matrimonic, and the preservation of the State, they should not need to inuent the degree of consanguinitie, being knowne to all men that the King and Queene are in the third degree, a blemish which hath alwayes accompanied the Marriage since the solemnisation thereof, and the which was not taken away by the breefe of Pope Gregory the 13. for that the necessary and essentiall formes were not obserued. After that hee had shewed the necessity & profit of this separation, he beseecheth the King to chooſe his second Wife, in a cheefe and soueraigne Familie, and which had bene heretofore honoured with the like happines, and to consider that so great a Realme flourishing in Princes and many Noblemen and ancient houses, cannot easily submit themselves to the command of those which by both sides shall not be of the bloud royall or soueraigne, halfe Princes, halfe simple gentlemen. And if at any time wee must respect the distinction of Birthes & Races, it must be when as they that come, are borne to command ouer others.

That they could not giue Heires to a Realme of too worthie a Houſe: and if hee bee not equall by the Fathers ſide, yet at the leaſt that he come neere vnto it, for men being by nature high minded, do not willingly ſubmit themſelues to them whom they thinke to bee inferiour vnto their Fathers, vnto whoſe commaund they haue bene inured.

The King was well pleased wth this discour, and aduertised Queene Marguerit thereof by L. Angloys one of the Masters of Requests of his Maiesties houshold, to vnderstand her resolution touching the nullitie of their Marriage. Shee (who vpon the like demand during the life of the Duchesse of Beaufort had made refusall for some reasons,) returned him answer, that shee would deliuer her mynd vnto Bertkier, Agent for the Clergie and Intendant of her affaires. The Kings intentions were imparted vnto him, and hee sent vnto her: who returned with this answer vnto the King and his Council. That shee desired nothing more then the Kings contentment, and the quiet of the Realme, and withall shee sent a priuat letter vnto his Maiestie, beseeching him, To grace her with his protection, vnder the shadow whereof shee would passe the remainder of her yeares.

Her request to the Pope.

The sayd Queene sent a Petition vnto the Pope, conteyning, That her brother King Charles the 9, and the Queene her mother had married her against her will, to which marriage her heart had neuer consented: That the King and shee being in the third degree of consanguinitie, she beseeched his Holines to declare the marriage void. The King made the like request.

A request. This business was managed very seriously by the Cardinal of Offat and by the Lord of Silvery the Kings Ambassador at Rome (who at the same time pursued the Judgement of the Marquitate of Saluces) They beseeched his Holiness in his Majesty's name: That for that which should concerne the nullity of the sayd marriage, he desired no other favour then that of Justice.

This business was imparted by the Pope unto the Consistory, and many reasons set downe to proue the nullity of the marriage. All the difficulty was, that Pope Clement the 8. thought it some-what strange, that hee should declare that marriage voyde, which Pope Gregory the 13. had approued, and who by his absolute authoritie had taken away all letts and hindrances. All which was answered at large. And although it

Queene
answere.

E At the same time she tasted the effects of the Kings liberality by the increase of her pensions, lyuing happily at Veſen nere to Aurillac, in the tranquillity and silence of her fortune. This change is no let, but shee shalbe alwaies one of the first Princeſſes of Europe. No man can take from her that which Heauen and Nature haue given her. It is a Theater, which although it hath been beaten with lightning, is still admired. And to speake the truth without affectation or flattery, shee her selfe hath ruined the greatness of her fortune, in that shee would be what she is.

This marriage is no sooner dissolued, but they treat of another. In the blessings whereof the French promise vnto themselves the increase and continuance of those of Heauen. The great Duke of Tuscany did carefully keepe Mary of Medicis his Neece to increase the Honour of his house by some great alliance. It was in a season when as the Soueraigne houses of Europe had no Daughters ready to marry, or there was some disparity for their Age, or Religion. Great and important considerations, which Princes should not passe ouer lightly. It seemes, that the eternall wisdom, which concludes 1599. concludes the Marriages of Princes in Heauen, and bleſſeth them on earth, would not A marry this Princeſſe vnto the Emperour, but reſerued her for the good of a greater Empire, not being pleaſed that France ſhould ſecke the means to continue the Crowne in the Kings Poſterity, any where elſe but at Florence, one of the eyes of Italy, and in the houſe of Medici, which goeth equally with the firſt in Italie. The hiſtory of which houſe you may read at large in the Originall. Coſmo ſurnamed by Piſtus the firſt the Great of Tuſcane, had by Madame Elconor of Toledo Daughter to the Viceroy of Naples, Francis, Ferdinand, Peter, Garcia, Iſabelle and Elconor. Francis married Ioane of Auſtria Daughter to the Emperour Ferdinand. Of this marriage came two Daughters, Elconor & Mary: the firſt is married to the Duke of Mantona, the venture and good fortune of the other is reſerued to be Queene of France. And the King being now ſet at liberty, fixt all his thoughts vpon her marriage.

The Prince of Orange, being returned out of France, from his Ambaſſage, and come to Bruxelles, the Arch-duke made him Knight of the Golden Fleece, with the Duke of Archeſot, the Marquis of Haurech, and the Count Egmont. The Cardinall had bene gouernor in the Lowe Countries almoſt a whole yeare: all his exploits were reduced to the fort which he cauſed to be built in the Iſle of Bommell, called Saint Andrewes fort, being inexpugnable, (which commonly they called the ſpectacle of Holland) the which being finiſhed, the Arch-duke retired his army out of the Iſle of Bommell, and put his men into gariſon. All the reſt of the yeare their Highneſſes ſpent in making their entries into the Townes of the Lowe Countries, trying all meanes to haue a Peace with the Hollanders. Yea the Emperour laboring ſtill to make this Peace, ſent vnto them for his Ambaſſadors Count Salendus of Iſembourg and Herman Manderſchiden, who let the States of the vniited Prouinces vnderſtand his Emperiall Maieſties intent. Wherevnto the States anſwere by Writing.

That it would pleaſe his Emperiall Maieſty to remember their former anſweres, by the which they had ſufficiently declared, That they could aſſure themſelues, neither of the Arch-duke, nor of the Infanta, ſeeing they are in the Spaniards power: that alſo their power and command ouer the Lowe Countries was a maniſeſt fraude, and al- though it were true for the Country of Flanders, yet doth it not follow that it ſhould hold for Holland and Zelande, whereas the King of Spaine hath no right. Moreover the King of Spaine ſeckes but to command ouer all Eitates, vnder the pretext of Religion, the which hee abuſeth for pretext of his Ambition, hauing no touch of Piety in his Soule. And this is all which his Emperiall Maieſty may expect of the reſolution of the ſayd Eſtates, being reſolved to defend themſelues from the tiranie of the Spaniards, and their oppreſſions. And ſo the Ambaſſadors returned without doing any thing.

The Duke of Sauoy had ſent many of his Miniſters into France, to treat vpon the difference for the Marquiſate of Saluces, without expecting the Popes ſentence. At the voyages which Iacob, the Preſident Rochette, the Marquis of Lullins, the Cheualier Breton and Roncas his Secretary had made, brought him no other fruit then to haue obſerued the State of the Court, peered a little into the Kings deſſeins, the which is al- uayes the firſt of an Ambaſſadors inſtructions, and noted the countenance of ſome ſpirits impatient of reſt and deſirous of change. And although the Patriarke of Conſtantinople had by his perſwaſions drawne more from the King then the Duke of Sauoy hoped for, yet could hee neuer change the reſolution which the King had taken to haue the Marquiſate againe. He was at Lions whereas ſickeſſe ſtaied him for a time: The King hauing commanded the Gouernor of Lions to Lodge him, Feaſt him, and ſupply all his wants: Roncas attended vntill he was recovered, to conſult and accompany him according to the order which the Duke had giuen him. But as things went on more ſlowly then he deſired, he thought that this purſuite required a greater preſence and action: that hee himſelfe muſt do his owne Ambaſſage, promiſing more vnto himſelfe by his only ſhadow, then by all the ſoliciting of ſeruants. He therefore prepared himſelfe to go to the King, although the chiefe of his Councell diſſwaded him.

The

A The onely thought of this voyage made him irreconcilable to the King of Spaine, although it had not paſt the tearmes of a ſimple propoſition, ſo did he make ſhew to be deſirous to breake wholly with him: he had in ſhew great occaſions to complaine of his frienſhip and ſuccors, who did but entertaine his greefe, and made the cure deſperate. It is good for a Prince to know the humor of many nations. He knew the Spaniards well: their manner of liuing: the ruinous conditions which they lay vpon them whome they aſſiſt: the length and languiſhing of their promiſes were odious vnto him. He did conſider the Iniuſtice, and Inequality in the Portion of the Infanta his Wife, who of ſo many Scepters and Crownes which the King her father had, receiued but ſixſcore thouſand Crownes of yeerely penſion, whereas the eldeſt had the Low Countries, and the Franch Countie in marriage. He could not forget, that at the treatie of Vernims, he had bene in a manner forgotten, and that a peace was almoſt concluded before they thought of him. Hee beleued that if the Spaniard would, the queſtion for the Marquiſate of Saluces had bene ended, the which might haue bene left to him in exchange of Calaïs, Dorlaus, Ardres, and other places. That the King of Spaine did thinke (that to preuent that all theſe diſcontentments ſhould not carrie this Prince to ſome dangerous party) it was neceſſary to tie him vnto the Crowne of Spaine by ſome ſtrong bond. They therefore demand the firſt Prince and the firſt Infanta, vnder colour to bring them vp after a royall manner, and in a Court whereas they might one day hope to raigne. The Duke was diſcontented with this demaund, perceiuing well that it proceeded more from diſtruſt, then affection. His Councell aduiſed him to giue this content vnto the King of Spaine, that hee could not lodge his Children better, and that that was the Vniting and very cement of perfect frienſhip. Yet he reſolved to keepe his children, and to ſend the Count la Motte to make his excuſe, that the preſent eſtate of his affaires would not ſuffer him to ſend them, nor to provide them a trayne and furniture fit for the voyage.

The King of Spaine to take away all excuſe, giues order to haue money provided for him at Milan, and perſwades the Duke to ſend the Count la Motte as Gouernour and conductor of the Prince. The Duke takes the money, and keepeſ the ware, ſaying that the ayre of Spaine was not proper for his Children, that their indiſpoſition and the tendernes of their age, would not ſuffer him to hazard them ſo ſoone in ſo long a voyage. This reſuſall offended the King of Spaine, and makes the Duke to reſolue vpon that which he held moſt profitable. From that time he could no more looke on a Spaniard. He then left the Spaniſh Ambaſſador at Turin and came to Chambery. When as he did ſee any one a farre off in his Councell of the Spaniſh faction, he looks on him with ſuch a diſdainfull eye, as hee ſhewes himſelfe no more in his preſence: he ſcornes the Spaniſh faſhion, and commendeth the French, ſaying, that there is no ſuch felicitie as to conquer ones ſelfe, and to yeeld himſelfe abſolutely vnto himſelfe.

The King was long before he would yeeld vnto the Dukes coming into France, ſaying, that it was not neceſſary hee ſhould paſſe the mountaines without the Marquiſate of Saluces. But the Cheualier Breton and Roncas did preſſe the King, that hee would bee pleaſed to giue their Maſter leaue to ſee him, aſſuring him that hee would giue him all content. The firſt was framed to the faſhion of that Court, and did beleue that when they ſhould ſee a Prince great in Iudgment, admirable in liberalitie, and indued with many excellent qualities, they would grant him all without any difficulty. Many diſſwaded the Duke from this voyage, laying before him the dangers in truſting a great enemy, wanting no examples, whereof one in ſuch remarkable accidents were ſufficient to make him to change his mind, and to ground his iudgment vpon experience.

F Roncas returned from the Court: he found the Duke at Hautecombe, and brings him letters from the King, fuller of deſire to ſee him, then of any hope that this enteruiue ſhould yeeld him any great profit. This letter well conſidered, was not ſufficient to make the way for ſucha paſſage, ſhewing that although the King deſired his 1599. his comming, it was alwaies without preiudice, to haue reason of the Marquise. It was imparted to the Councell: whereof some sayd, that this voyage would be an offence which Spaine would neuer pardon: others sayd, that the end of this game would be the losse of the friend-shipp of the King of Spaine, which would bee profitable to the Duke and necessary for his Children. The Duke answers, that the Marquis is ill aduised that strikes often against the rocke where he hath many times suffered shipwracke. That the hatred of Spaine would make the conditions of the treaty more easie and beneficial, and would lay open that which none but himselfe could expresse, carrying in his brest certaine desseins which hee could not trust to any but himselfe. There was no reason of force to make him change this opinion. He sayd, that as soone as he had seene the King hee should be content. They had much adoe to perswade him not to send an Ambassador, but a simple Post vnto the King of Spaine, not to aske his aduice, but to carry him assurance of his going into France: the which hee undertooke when as they could not beleue it in Court, thinking that hee had changed his resolution.

When as all doubts were taken away, the King gaue order for his receyuing, commanding the Gouvernor of Lions, to prepare the Arch-bishops lodging for his owne person, and the next houses for the Noblemen of his Court: That he should accompany him in the best sort he could to any thing that he desired to see within the Towne. That he should go & meete him the mid-way of the last post, with all the Nobility of his Government: that they of the Towne should attend him at the gate when he should enter, and that the Prouost of Marchants should tell him, that he had commandement to do him the same Honour that was to bee done to his Maiesty, and visiting him in his lodging, to present vnto him the goodliest & rarest fruites that might bee found in the Country, and that they should feast him, & defray him with all his traine. This was executed with such order and state, as the Duke hath sayd often since, that this entertainment had bound him. The Earles of the great Church of Lions were in doubt whether they should receiue this Prince as they had done the Duke Emanuel Philibert his Father.

The Dukes of Sauoy, as Earles of Villards and Soueraignes of that County in the Country of Bresse, haue had place as Chanoin of Honour in that Church, the which is presented vnto them the first time they enter. The same Honour should haue bene offred vnto the Duke passing by Lions, as had bene giuen vnto his Father when he came after the Peace in the yeare 1559. if things had bene in the same Estate, or if they had not found a greater difference. The Chapter of this Church had great reason to intreat the Prince as they had done his Predecessors, seeing the King would haue him receiued like vnto his Maiesty, and giue him that testimony of Honour, the effect whereof did Honour them as much that gaue it, as he could finde himselfe honoured that receiued it. But for that through the Kings Conquest the County of Villards was no more vnder his obedience; that things were yet in suspence of Warre or Peace; that Princes are alwaies offended with the communication of such Honours; hee resolved not to do any thing therein, but what it should please the King to appoint. He doth aske the Gouvernors aduice. whereupon la Faye, one of the Earles of that Church, was sent to Court, to knowe the Kings pleasure touching this difficulty.

The King demanded of him, what a Chanoine of Honour was, and if the Duke of Sauoyes reception had bene like vnto his. La Faye answered, that the great and famous Churches of Europe had Chanoines of Honour, who were either Soueraigne Princes, (in whose domynions they were founded) or forraigne Princes, who by their piety haue bound the Church to this acknowledgement of Honour. That the place of a Chanoine of Honour, is neither for the office, nor for the charge, but onely for reuerence and priuiledge: for as the Prince who is a Chanoine of Honour, is not bound to any other thing, but to sweare the protection and preservation of the rights of the Church, so he reapes no other profit, but is partaker of their Prayers which they make there.

That

A That this Honour should be of small import, if the greatnesse of Princes which had desired it, did not make it great in a great Church, the which being one of the cheife of France as well in Antiquity as in Dignity, the reputation thereof haue bene spread in farre nations, who haue founded their Churches after this modell. That this Honour had bene giuen in ancient time to the most Christian Kings, to the Dukes of Sauoy Earles of Villards, to the Dukes of Bourgandy, Dukes of Berry, and Dauphins of Viennois, which haue bene received Cannons of Honour in that Church, but those receptions did differ from that of the Kings.

The King asked the opinion of his Councell in that case, and by their aduice he answered, that the Duke of Sauoy holding no more the County of Villards, should not pretend the rights that depended thereon: that comming into France, to reconcile himselfe vnto his Maiesty, hee would make so small an aboad in Lions as hee did not thinke that hee would stay for so simple a Ceremony. That if he should demand that place of Chanoine of Honour as they had giuen it to his deceased Father, the Chapter should excuse themselves, vntill they knewe the Kings pleasure, to do their duties at his returne.

The Duke was much offended with the refusall of that was due to him, and the which they had giuen vnto his deceased Father. Neither did hee dissemble his discontent, for he would not go into this Church, although he were lodged in the Arch-bishops Pallace, nor passe ouer the place which is before the principall doore: and when as the Deane with the whole body of the Church went to salute him, hee sayd that he had alwaies honored that Companie, as hauing the Honour to be of it. Being receiued into Lions according to the Kings order & command, he had many prefaces of discontentment in his voyage. His seruants in Court aduertised him that if he came without other desseine then to offer the Marquisate of Saluces, hee would repent his comming. One sayd vnto him that hee should not get any great matter of the King, seeing hee was not pleased that the Cathedrall Church at Lions should afford him a little Honour and Ceremony. A man at armes of the company of the Marquis of Vrse, was put in prison vpon a false aduice that came from Genewa, that hee followed the Duke with an intent to do a bad act at Paris. It was strange in Court that the King had not sent any other vnto him then the Controulr generall of the Postes.

But nothing troubled him more, then when as Varenne (among other discourtes which the Duke offred, to sound their opinions touching his voyage) sayd vnto him, he should bee welcome so as hee restored the Marquisate. A speech which toucht the Duke vnto the quick, who esteemed not all the Estates of his patri mony, as the Marquisate alone. It is true that they loue that better which they haue gotten, then that which hath bene purchased by their Predecessors. Hee went by post from Lions to Roane: from thence hee went by water to Orleans, whether the King sent the Duke of Nemours to receiue him. Betwixt Orleans and Fontainebleau he was met first by the Marshal Siron, and then by the Duke Montpensier, being followed by many Noblemen.

The 13. of December at night (a memorable day for the Kings birthe) hee arose when he knewe his traine to bee a sleepe, and departs secretly to get to Fontainebleau before his people were awake. Varenne who had commandement from the King to come before & aduertise him, had much adoe to follow him, and if the Duke had found horses readie at the first post, they had not carried the first newes of his arrivall.

He found the King comming from Masse, with all the Noblemen of his Court, attended all in redde, and ready to go to horse-backe to meete him: they did wa'ke long together after their first imbracings & excuses. Then the Duke told him the occasions of his voyage, the which he had kept secret from his Councell: But hee could drawe nothing from the King by this first parle, but hee should haue him his friend in yielding him his Marquisate. It is a difficult thing to feede a King with a white beard with words. The King sayd alwaies that he desired nothing but his owne. And the Duke of Sauoy

A free & couragious speech in anothers Country, not among his owne people, but to Villeroy the Kings chiefe & most confident Secretary of State. From Fontainebleau he went to Paris with a goodly traine, he was lodged in the Louvre & spent the Christmas in Nemours house. He admired this great Court, where he sees the chiefe Noblemen of the realme, and noted that L'Esdaignieres who had so much troubled him, was not so great in Court as in Dauphiné. The Dukes presence did increase his reputation, he gouerned his actions in such sort, as hee freed the skorne & mockery of the Court. Duke of Mer-
into Hungary in October, 1599.

This yeare ended in all sorts of pleasures and sports, familiarities and profes of true friendship, so as many beleued that the two hearts and the two Courts of these Princes were but one, but there was alwaies some marke of constraint, and amidst their embrasings there alwaies past some gird or quip. The King who is ready and sodaine in his answers, gaue him alwaies some touch to thinke on. There was too great difference betwixt the tunes of their humors to make along & good harmony. But whilst the Court abounds in pleasure and delights, the Duke Mercure is in Hungary, in the midst of many discomodities, which he holds pleasing for Gods cause: but before he goes he giues them occasion to talke of him in the Court of Parliament. He had a cause pleaded there, and his Aduocate gaue him the quality of a Prince: Seru in the Kings Aduocate, (holding it a base preuention to be silent at that which ought to be spoken for the Kings seruice and the Lawe of State) did shew that that quality did not belong to any, but to Princes of the blood. The Duchesse of Mercure (who was then in presence) sayd that they could not take from her Husband a quality that was due vnto him by the right of his birth, and that the King held him so.

The Duke Mercure, holding that which the Kings Aduocate had sayd in discharge of his duty for a brauado and a contempt, went the same day vnto his house, and gaue him iniurious words. The King being aduertised thereof, held it a bold act. The Court esteemed the iniury done vnto them, & desired the more to reparaire it, for that the honor of the Kings seruice was wronged, and that it had bin done in sight of the Parliament of the Capital City of the Realme, & in his house that was wronged, the which should be to euery man an inuolable Sanctuary. The Court decreed that he should be personally adioined, and had proceeded further if the Kings commandement had not stayd them. It was a great vertue in the President Lizet, when he decreed that the quality of Prince (which the Cardinall of Lorraine tooke) should be raised out of his Aduocates pleadings. The Cardinall complayned vnto the King: but the President Lizet answered with such Courage and Constancy before the King being in Councell, that the Cardinall was no Prince nor equall to Princes, & if you will saye it, shew vs the place of your Principality. A free speech which purchased the old man much reputation, & yet within two yeares after he made him resigne his place vnder an other pretext. There was no Nobleman in France that vsed the benefit of the Peace more worthily than the Duke Mercure, for disdayning the idleness of the Court and the ease of his house, hee employed himselfe to succor the Christians, against the greatest enemy of their Religion. He leads with him the Count of Chaligny his brother, with some gentlemen at his owne charge, resolving to imploy his Goods as well as his Life in this holy warre, hauing vowed to serue Christendome two yeares at his owne charge. Hee shewed himselfe a great Captaine as well to defend as to assault, hauing kept the enemy with an army of a hundred and fifty thousand men from besieging of Strigonia: this was in his first voiage, before whose returne the Emperour desired to see him, and intreated him to take his way by Prague.

What past in Hungary.

After the raising of the sege of Buda or Belgrade, the Christian army was dismissed & sent to Garisons, & Buda receiued a new Bascha. The Knights of Comorre at the beginning had defeated part of the troupes which were come to conduct & accompany the Bascha, they spoiled a Ship, & being laden with spoile they returned to their companions.

The

A The Turke sent sixe Shippes to Buda, and changed al the Estate, and one of the Baschas which had bene there during the sege (who had bene of opinion to yeeld the place) was punished. It was thought the Bascha of Agria would haue giuen some notable attempt, hauing made great preparation for Warre in diuers places, and prouided three hundred barrells of poulder. Those of Sigeth on the other side, hauing made Souldiers Coates of the Germane fashion, thought to surprize the Christians, but they failed being discouered.

The Tartares, which adhere vnto the Turke (by his commandement) spoyled the Country vpon the riuer of Hipolis, and fell vpon Pesse, Zolneck and Hattouan, Townes subiect vnto the Turke who being tired with their courtes, and exhausted of money by the great warres hee had against the Persian, hee resolved to demaund a Peace of the Emperour. The Tartares came to make this demand at Vienna in the beginning of February, who being adressed vnto the Arch-duke Mathias, they had no answer, but returned as they came, by reason of the spoile their men made: this request was not reported vnto the Emperour, nor vnto the Court at Prague. In the meane time the Tartare, made a furious reuenge hauing surprised the City of Tolise, and put all to fire and sword, they slue all within it that were of mans age: and had done worse if the Lord of Palsi had not made head against them, and slaine some among others three Captaines, who choose rather to bee slaine then to yeeld, except one Valler who demanded his life, and was saued.

C They of Ratzon withall their men retired vnto the Mountaines to auoide the fury of the Tartares: but they of Crabatzen resisted them brauely, and tooke one of their Captaines. Those of Vaxenice (vnto Buda) defeated a great number, being gone to freeboote neere to Palaner, Mengrade and Zetischen, but the rest of the Tartares hauing notice thereof, burnt about thirty villages neere vnto Calon, which had like to haue bene taken, and Laomare also, if it had not bene well manned: but they durst not sally forth for that the enemy was about 12. thousand. The Fort of Canisia was also burnt at that time, whereas the soldiars and the Inhabitants lost all their baggage & mouables. About that time the garrison of Strigonia defeated a Conuoy, & tooke a great Booty. Orspetre the Gouvernors Lieutenant, got much welth and honor among other things he had a Gowne of cloath of Tissue of Gold and Siluer, which was sent to the Bascha, and knowing that the Fort of Wailes was fallen, hee enters it and defeats the garrison with the Aga (which is the Governour) and deliuered them of Bischir. The Heiducks, (which are horsemen) led away 800. Sheepe which did greatly releue Strigonia.

In the meane time there happened a great alteration in Transilvania: the Vanoide Sigismond (who had before accepted a recompence of the Emperour to deliuer Transilvania into his hands) hauing gonne from his word, hee prest the Emperour by the Bishop of Alba-Iulia, and by Stephen Paschay his Chancellor, to restore him Transilvania againe. And without attending any answer, he goes thither in post, takes it againe, and makes his Cousine Andrew Battory the Cardinall, to sweare fealty vnto him, the which he did also cause George Balte to approue, being then at Cassouia in heigh Hungary, General of the Emperours army, who was therein surprized: for hee gaue him to vnderstand, that it was for the good of Christendome: and in the meane time Cardinal Andrew treated with the Turke by safe conduct. The Emperour sent Doctor Petzen thither, but coming to Thorne the Principall Towne, he found that it was too late. Afterwards the Popes Nuntio interposed himselfe, & there was some hope of reconciliation. About that time, three hundred Christians of Canisia defeated foure hundred Turkes of Sigeth, and not one escaped. Schwartzebourg General of the Christian army, with Palsi and Nadasse attempted Buda in vaine, but they surprised Schambock, notwithstanding the resistance which the garrison made. On the other side certaine Hussars, Cedryns and Palkceins which went to Zolneck, defeated a troupe of Turkes and Tartares: and contrariwise the Tartares spoiled Hungary and Transilvania, firing all, euen vnto Cassouia and Asilech, where the Christians taking courage slue all these firebrands: this execution was done by the Peasants.

1599. Now did Cardinall Andrew Battory send letters of excuse to the Emperour, with assurance to bee alwaies faithfull vnto Christendome, and that he would loone restore the Contract by an Ambassage, which he would send expressely. Schwartzenbourg sent twelve thousand men out of Comorre, and laide them in Ambush in a Valley nere vnto Tuda of purpose to surpris the Towne, but not being able to effect it, they spoiled the suburbs, the enemy not daring to fallly forth. And the next day he detoured a Conuoy which carried money vnto Agris, where 400. Turkes were illicite, and the Bega him'selfe taken prisoner, which was the Captaine of Hattouan. The Emperour, to encourage the Nobility, did honour Melchior Reder and Rebess his Lieutenant with the Order of Knight-hood, for that they had valiantly defended the siege of Varadin.

Reder and Rebess made Knights by the Emperour.

The Turkes defeated by the Christians.

Ambassadors from the Moscovite to the Poland.

The Moscovite sends Ambassadors to the Emperour.

The great Duke of Moscovia presents to the Emperour.

The first of Iune the Christians of Comorre, et vpon the Castell of Bique and took it, although Igin (a name of the Country) being revolted, had discovered vnto the Bega the estate of the Christians, & they returne victors with a Conuoy that Palfi sent them, by reason of the Tartares courses. The Emperall army was not yet come into Hungary, although the troupes of Suedenland were discombed by the river of Danubius, & Colonel Osterrues of Saxony had also brought a thousand soldiors. The other Princes of Saxony sent not any, by reason of the courses of the Admirall of Spain vpon the territories of the Empire, as hath bene sayd. But God gaue a great victory to the Christians beeing but fewe in number, against a great multitude of Turkes: they had intelligence that five thousand Turkes went with a Conuoy of victualls, vpon the Danube, vnto Buda, the which was wonderfully prest with famine, the Christians knowing that the enemies would refresh themselves at Pest, layed an Ambush nere vnto Buda, and cut all these troupes in peeces, taking a great spoile, to the great confusion and hindrance of the Turkes. About the same time, God put it in the minde of the Duke of Moscovy to aide the Christians against the Turke, he sent first vnto the King of Poland, an houre-glasse of sand, a Cimiter halfe drawne, and some Petronells. Some did interpret this as a defiance of War, taking the houre-glasse to signifie that the time of offence betwixt them was past, the Petronells berokened war, but the Cimiter halfe drawne signified that the Duke of Moscovy was ready either for Peace or Warre. But the Moscovites Ambassafor declared the contrary, and that his Master desired passage for forty thousand men through Poland, the which hee would send vnto the Emperour, against the D Turkes, in fauor of Christians, & that there should be a perpetuall Peace betwixt the Polonians & the Moscovites. The Polonians (being suspicious by nature) denied a passage for 40000. horse through their Country, and as for a Peace, the Estates should deliberate thereon in their next assembly. The Duke of Moscovy apprehending this injury, scorned the Polonois, & caused his Ambassadors to imbarke on S. Nicholas day in an English ship which coasted aboute Suedenland, Norway and Denmarke, to enter into Germany, by the river of Elbe, hauing been three monethes in this voyage, in the end they arrived at Stode, & so passing by Hamberow, Lubeck & Magdebourg, they came into Bohemia where the Emperour was. They were honorably receiued at Lubeck and Hamberow, where they gaue away publicly great sums of money vnto the poorer sort, & gaue hope vnto the E Hans Townes that their Masters would cōfirme their priuileges in his great City of Nyogard in Moscovia. The Emperour gaue the audience at Pilsen, for that the plague was at Prague. The day the Emperour gaue them and once, they caused the presents that were sent by their great Duke to bee carried before them, which were many white Falcons, a Horsemans Mace all couered with precious stones set in gold, a great Cuppe with two handles all of gold, a cloth of gold with the Image of S. Nicholas (whom they especially reuerence) certaine peeces of Perfume cloth wrought with Gold, foure timbers of Sables, and summe Foxes skins as blacke as Veller. After the presents the two Secretaries followed, holding two letters in their hands being lift vp on high, the one from the great Duke of Moscovy, named Borissou, & the other fro the Prince his Sonne. F both written to the Emperour, the which carried credit for the Ambassador, who presented the letters and presents him'selfe. The Emperour receiued them very graciously, with offer of all reciprocal friend-shipp. But of all their promises there was nothing effected by reason of the Icaloussie and Hatred of the Polonians against the Moscovites.

We

A We haue before shewed what happened to the King of Poland in his calme of Suedenland, & how that after he had made a Peace nere vnto Stockholme with his uncle Charles Duke of Snyderland, who in fleede of coming to twaie the obseruation of the layd accord, was returned to Colmar and so into Poland, leading his Sister with him. The Suedens who had yeelded vnto his party, would not follow him into Poland, but remayned at Colmar, which is a Sea Towne where the layd King of Poland had left Ladylaus for Governor, assisted by John Sparre and other Nobles of Suedenland. Charles seeing the King his Nephews retreat, besieged them, and made them ready to yeeld by famine. During the siege (not that he would not seeme to imbrue the accord made betwixt his nephew and himselfe) the Estates to the Towne of Inceop, being assigned vnto Lyncop, who confirmed all the ordinances of Oberg and Sundercep, and the two precedent Conuocations of States by the which it had bene decreed, that Charles should be sole Administrator.

That they should send an Ambassage vnto the King, to let him vnderstand, that if he came in armes, they would oppose themselves. If otherwise, the Realme desired him. That if the affaires of Poland did detain him, he should send his eldest Sonne Vladislau, or his brother Duke John, to settle the Realme of Sueden according to their ancient lawes.

Whilest they expected his answer, Charles takes Colmar and sendes away Duke Charles freely the Hungarians, Polonians and Germanians, and hanged all the Nobles of Suedenland hang up the Nobles of Suedenland that to the number of 48. John Sparre, with Christopher, Laurence & Adam with their heads: Suedenland that Ladylaus Ecchez was in like sort condemned, but the King sent him manes to saue his life, by the yeelding vp of the Sueden prisoners, whom the King had carried away with him. So as the Souldiers which followed the King did afterwards hold for Charles, to those that would depart he gaue leaue, and appointed them two ships to returne by Pomerania, and hauing armed his ships of War, he lett them in Garrison at Colmar, the rest of the Fleet he sendes by the Baltike Sea, the which doth much annoy them of Luce, and the Country thereabouts. But not content with all this, he assembles the States againe at Stockholme, where he propounded seven Articles.

1. That they should allowe of the taking of Colmar, seeing that the King would keepe it with a Garrison of strangers, against the Lawes of Sueden.
2. That they should ratifie the orders made at Lyncop, and Inceop according to the Peace sworn at Lyncop, vpon condition, that the said Towne of Colmar should be restored vnto the Suedens.
3. If they would haue him to mainteyne them still in liberty, they should provide to gaue him more means, for the recovery of Finland and Lsuonia, and other Countries subiect to the Crowne of Sueden.
4. That they should attaine the Archbishop of Stockholme & other seditious Counsellors, who had practised against his life.
5. That those of Lubeck, should be punished in hostile manner, for that they had declared themselves enemies to the State.
6. That all the Seditious should be punished, and their goods confiscated, or at the least banished, and their families degraded of all dignity: and that they should consider, what they would do therein.
7. That seeing the King would not vouchsafe to answer the Ambassage of the States held at Inceop, to know whether they were any more bound to him by obedience, & what they expected more.

See how this ambitious spirit subiected himselfe to the humour of a multitude to attaine to that degree, which he could not hope for. Notwithstanding it was decreed, that King Sigismund was no more their King, but his son Prince Vladislau was not excluded, & within two yeares he came into Sueden, to mainteine the auncient Lawes of the Country, & for default thereof, they would provide for the State according to Custom. All the rest of the Articles were gratned, so as being transported with pride & vaine glory, he entred presently into Finland where without the succors of John Back a great great Captaine of Finland, he had beene in danger of his life by the meanes of Aschel A Kork a Finlandois, who held for the King, so as Aschel was forced to retyre to Vibourg, but the Vibourgeois being loth to hazard the fortune of the Warre, disinffed him, and receiued Charles Viceroy of Sueden, who a little before had taken Helsingfor, which was the cheefe caule that Vibourg yeilded, where their three braue Captaines, Gysper Tisfen, and William Faremsbach remayned prisoners in the Castell of Vibourg, and Thomas Greue saued him selfe.

All things falling out successfullly, he came to Nience with fixe ships of warre, hauing sent Peter Stoly, a Nobleman of Suedeland thither before, and was receiued by the Russians, and them of Luangrode, the Capital Cittie of Russia. He fought also to reduce them of Riualia to the obedience of the State, which is the vtermost bound of the Baltike Sea, who answered. That they would not acknowledge any but Sygismond, and resisted him. In the meane time the Fort of Ahoruie in Finland being yeilded, Charles put garrisons in the places which he had taken, and leauing Jeams Schel Admirall, and his Lieutenant Generall, he returned into Sueden about the end of Nouember, where we will leaue him, to finish the Christians enterprises this yeare against the Turke. The Heidugues attempted the Castell of Formes beneath Buda, being repulst from it with the Cannō, hauing lost about 400. men, they brake the bridge of Transluania, & tooke 2. Castels, ruining all the other bridges, & sinking the boats of the passages, the which did greatly annoy the Turke. For this cause Schwartzebourg did againe try if he could surprise Buda, but Colonel Orspire incourting with certaine Turkes, some of them went presently to Buda, to giue them intelligence thereof. the which was contemned by the Bascha, who issuing forth off the Towne, was taken by the Christians, and led to Schwartzebourg, who sent him to the Emperour with certaine enfeigns which the Barons of Pulsi and Nadasse had taken from the Tartarians, Pesta was beseegeed, where Schwartzebourg was sore hurt in the foote; the Emperour to keepe him still in the army, sent him a chaire, in the which he might sit without paine. The Bascha Serdar being in Buda, threatened to beseege Strigonia, the which was furnished for all euents, that the Forts built by Count Charles Mansfelt, might hold firme. In the meane time Paul de Niar Gouvernour of Varadin tooke the Towne Zarrada, and placed a garrison there.

During these attempts, they did not forberae to talke of peace. A place was appointed for the assembly. The great Cham of the Tartares sent his Deputies, and Sardar the new Bascha of Buda, sent Amurath Basha and Ameth for the Turke, and for the Emperour, Schwartzebourg Pulsi, Nadasse, and Doctor Peizen: but the demanded Iuuarin, Fillech, and Serchin to be reitored vnto them, and they would deliuer vp Agria, so as nothing could be concluded. Presently after, Pulsi defeated 700. Turkes. The Tartarians nere to Fillec, to the number of 3000. were charged by the Hussars (which are Hungarian Knights) & almost all slaine. At that time two Turks turned Christians, who discouered that Serdar Bascha was countermanded by the great Turke, who was much afflicted by the Persians and Georgians: so as Serdar Bascha hauing made some countes vpon Fespaie and Pappe, he retired to Constantinople; and the Christian army was disinff by the Archduke Mathias for that yeare.

Whilest they laboured thus in Hungarie, all Transluania came into the Emperours power, by the meanes of Michael Vauoide or Palatin of Valachia, who chased the Cardinal Battory from thence, hauing put himselfe into the Turkes protection, and become his tributarie, and declared himselfe enemie both to the Emperour, and to Michael the Vauoide, who opposed himselfe against him with all his forces. The Palatin tooke Cronstar neere to Poland, and going downe that way, he conquered Halleis, and then the Castell of Fogear, finally he encountered the Cardinals armie neere vnto Cibigno, and vanquished it: of twentie fife men which fled with the Cardinal, there were few escaped, but all were slaine or taken, only the Cardinal saued himselfe. Istuan Battory Vncle to this miserable Cardinal, went from Alba Iulia into Claufembourg, with all the most precious things that he could gather together, but the Valachian followed him so neere, as he tooke him, and the Towne wherinto he was retired. By this meanes many Turkes and Tartares yeilded themselves vnto the sayd Michael, and afterwards became A became Christians, with their Wiues and Children.

The Turke sent an Ambassage to Michael the Palatin, to make an allyance with him, but the Palatin discoueing his treacherie, retained the Turkes Ambassadors to send them to the Emperour, and executed the spies of Serdar Bascha, so as all the Transluaniens yeilded vnto him: euen the worthy Alasfi, who might easily haue defended himselfe. Moreover Baniffy a cheete man was committed prisoner, by the Lords of Kaykel; and Istuan Battory who had escaped, was taken agayne at Sorbeil by the Colonel George Bassi, who being ioynd With Paul de Niar of Varadin, & David Huniades a Hungarian Prince, to succour the Palatin, serued vnder his pay.

Istuan had his life saued, vpon condition that he should cause Viuar, which held yet for the Card nall with 200. men to be yeilded vp, the which he did: & the Palatin, hauing put a Garrison into Lippe, a Frontier Towne ioyning to Tartary, he sent an Ambassage to the Emperour, passing by the Archduke Mathias, who after hee had giuen thanks vnto God, sent David Huniades and Lassa his Deputies to take possession, the which they did in Alba Iulia, with great solemnity, and great presents and honors done on eyther side. Yet soone after there was some trouble at Hast for that the Gouvernour would not receiue a Garrison of Germains, which Bassa would haue brought in, but by the wisdom of Doctor Peizen, all was friendly agreed, and the Palatin was content that his Valachians should retire, although he had made a Campe volant of Suezes to charge Bassa, yet there was Peace among them. After the losse of the Battel, the poore Cardinal Battory, flying with eight more with him into the mountaines, they were all slaine there by the Palachians, (whose names were not known) they cut off his head, & planting it vpon the end of a Lance, they presented it vnto the Palatin, who caused his body to be taken (hauing the little finger on the right hand cut off, on the which hee did were a ring of great price) & honourably buried in a goodly tombe which he himselfe had built for a brother of his. Such was the ende of this miserable Prince, who had other wise good parts in him, and was of an excellent spirit, but he wanted Iudgment at neede, being blinded with his ambition and desire of rule: wherevnto not any one shall euer attaine, but he to whom God hath giuen it.

They began to distrust the sincerity and fidelity of the Valachian, becing generally beleueed, that he would make his party a part, and diuide his forces from those of the Emperour: seeing him to fortifie the strong places of Transluania. But he sent his Ambassadors to the Emperour to assure him that the publike cause was his, and that he had no other desseine in this war, then the common good of Christendome, holding that what soeuer was not prosperous and happy to the General, could not be profitable nor happy to him in particular: but in the end God discouered and confounded his bad intentions. The Turke was stil very importune for a Peace, sometimes they demanded of him restitution of all the prisoners, and that hee should stay the Tartares courtes: the which Serdar Bascha refused, and therefore Pulsi, set vpon Resluer & Lachia (Towns of importance) the which were taken without fight. The Latzsens and Martolesins were put to death, for that being Christians they had serued the Turke. Moreover Palantuarcepp and Caret were yeilded, but Capos Viuar defended it selfe, where there died about two hundred Christians, & Captaine Morbourg was sore hurt in the left arme. In reuenge whereof the Christians of Comora charged the Tartarians halfe a league from Buda; deliuered 400. Christian prisoners; surprised two Barkes laden vpon the Danowe, the which were so rich as euery priuate soldiart had a hundred and fity crownes for his share. Such was the reuolution of this yeere in all parts of Europe, as much as might be discouered by the history of diuers nations.

The first day of the yeare, Pope Clement the 8. began the Iubile, which he could not performe on Christmas-Eue (as they had bin accustomed to do) by reason of his goute. It is hard to finde in any history the first institution of the yeare of Iubile, but it is apparent that Boniface the 8. did publish the first constitution in the yeare 1299. Publication of the Jubile.

The beginning of the Jubile.

The publication of the Jubile is made the day of the Ascension, the yeare before the Church of Saint Peter of Vatican, by two Preefts in two severall churches, one in the Church, the one reads the Bull in Latin, and the other in French, and it is proclaimed in the four corners of the Citie of Rome, to invite the four parts of the world to this holy yeare. On Christ mas eve at Evening time, the Jubile begins by a solemn procession, in the which the Pope, the Cardinals, Princes, Ambassadors, Prelats, and the Officers of Rome, march according to their order. The Pope is carried in a chaire, and stays at the holy doore, which is walled up, and neuer opens but the yeare of the Jubile. He carries a taper in one hand, and a little hammer of silver in the other, with the which he strikes three times vpon the wall, which is sodenly beateen downe by them that stand readie for that purpose. In doing this Ceremonie, his Holynes sayes many prayers, and blesseth the worke, whilest the Clergie sing Psalmes and Hymnes, the people gather vpon the peeces of bricke of the wall, which they keepe enviously. Then the Pope enters into the Church, and the Evening begins, and from that time the grace of the Jubile is communicated vntill the same day the next yeare, those that will gaine it, are bound to visit foure Churches, S. Peters, S. Paul, S. Iohn de Latran, and our Lady the great. The Prince of Parma was at the ouerture of the Jubile, and lodged, & well entertained at the Popes cost. He gained the Pardons and a Wife, the Pope hauing giue him his Niece, the eldest daughter of Iohn Francis Aldobrandin, who was not yet twelue yeares old, and therefore the Ceremonie of the marriage was deferred for three or foure moneths.

This opening of the Jubile was one of the foure great actions which made his Papacy happie and memorable. The first was the Kings Conuersion. The second the peace betwixt the two greatest Christian Monarks. The third was the reduction of the Duchie of Ferrara without warre. He is held a great Prince, and a very Father of Concord, euen by them that are enemies to his Papacie. This yeare there died many Cardinals, Andrew Battory died violently as I haue sayd. Cardinall Roderic who was come out of Poland to Rome to gaine the Jubile, died of a feuer. The Cardinall Arragon followed him at the same time: Cardinall Andrew of Austria. Cardinall Prinzi a Marke of Venice, and Cardinall Caietan did see the beginning, and not the ending, of the holy yeare. In the beginning of the yeare, the Duke of Sauoy sent the King two great Baskets, and two boxes of Cristall, the rarest peeces of the Cabinet of Esten, of Portugal his Grandmother, and of Lady Catherine the Infanta of Spaine & his wife, the which could not be valued neither for the matter, nor for the workmanship, and the King returned vnto the Duke a Jewell of Diamonds, in the midst whereof there was one Diamond transparent which discovered his Maiesties portrait, the which he esteemed so much, as hauing lost it once in dancing, he gaue five hundred Crowns to him that found it. The Duke was not to be imitated in his Bountie, and when as they thought that he had giuen all, he invited the King and the Court to a dancing, where he shewed himselfe so rich in Jewels, as they were esteemed to bee worth above sixe hundred thousand Crowns. He gaue presents to all the cheefe in Court, who accepted them with the Kings permission: Onely the Duke Biron refused the honies that he sent vnto him: but the King had nothing the better opinion of their intelligences, nor the Duke less assurance of his affection by this refusal, for it was cheefly for his sake, that the Duke of Sauoy had made his voyage, to draw him wholly from the Kings seruise. It was that great occasion which hee carried secret in his breast, and would not reueale vnto his Counsell, when they dissuaded his going into France: the Marquisate of Saluces was the pretext of his voyage, but the finishing of this great Conspiracie was the true cause. It was a goodly foyle well set out, but couered with a talic none.

A La Fin was employed as a Truchman of the wills of the Conspirators and Confederates. The first time that he had any speech with the Duke of Sauoy was the night after the feasts of Christmas, when he was brought into the Dukes chamber in Nemours house, by Signor Iacob without the prinitie of any other. The Duke of Nemours (comming to giue the Duke the good night) was intreated not to enter, for that the Duke would take his rest. They would not haue him acquainted with any thing, fearing lest hee should aduertise the King; hauing obserued what hee had the first day of the Dukes arrival, that nothing should draw him from the Kings seruise, and that excepted, he would do any thing for his Highnes. There was not any night but La Fin sent a good part of it, to acquaint him with the State of the Faction. Those that were of this intelligence, met at the most remote Churches, to acquaint one another with that which past. Nothing was sayd in the Kings Councell, but the Duke of Sauoy was presently aduertised thereof, by them that were at his deuotion. But hee had not yet spoken with the Duke Biron of their desseine, but by a third person it was necessarie they should ioyn to knit the knot of their vniou. They had both sought the occasion, but there was still some obstacle, or some spie that hindered them. They incountred a fit oportunitie at Corsins, being all alone, the King hauing commanded the Duke Biron to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy vntill his returne, they lost no time, in plying it but in three or foure words of trust, and assured intelligence, referring the rest, to the mediation of la Fin. Their discourse was broken off, by the coming of the Count Saiffons, and the Duke Montpensier.

C The Dukes proceeding therein, was very cunning and iudicious, for often times he would begin a discourse of the valour & courage of the Duke Biron, to sound the Kings opinion, who did not alwayes giue him the glory of those goodly executions, whereof hee wanted. The Duke did still aduertise the Duke Biron of any thing the King had sayd of him, that might any way alter him, which made him to breake forth in the bitterest words hee could against all respect of the Kings seruice, being very sensible of any thing that was spoken against the reputation of his valour, in regard whereof hee esteemed nothing: and when hee entred into the Historie of his life, hee would speake contemptibly of all the world, not sparing the King himselfe, whose valour and experience in militarie actions, hath obscured others, and forced them to confesse, that hee hath not benee aduanced to the Royall Throne by the benefit of Fortune, but by the vertue of his vertue.

E The Duke Biron committed great errors against the rules of such as haue a desire to raise and aduance their fortunes. No man must euer enter into comparisons of valour and sufficiencie with his Prince: hee may not dispute of his aduice, contradict his opinion, nor affect to seeme more aduised, more iudicious, nor more capable. Many haue benee cast away vpon this Shelle. The Duke Biron was of this humor. The exccesse of his courage made him to disallow with disdain, all that was not dohe or inuented by himselfe. Hee sayd sometimes vnto the King, that he would not haue them write in the Historie of France, that other then hee had done such and such a thing.

The second day of the yeare, the King went to Saint Germaine in Laie, leading the Duke with him, to shew him his buildings, his Grottes or Caves and his Chaires, and withall hee shewed him his other houses, and all the goodliest places about Paris. In the meane time hee dissembled his discontent, with so great wisdom, as hee seemed alwayes one, at the Table, at Hunting, at Play, and at Dancing: the King though hee refused what hee demanded, yet did hee still shew him new sights, to recompence the fained repentance of his voyage.

F After that hee had seene all that was rare about Paris, the King would shew him his Court of Parliament, for al that he had seene was nothing in respect of the admirable greatnes of that reuerent Court, whereof in former times, many Emperours, Kings and Princes, comming to Paris, had more admired the Iustice that was administrated there.

1600. there, then any thing else that they had seene. The King aduertised the chiefe President Achilles de Harley, that he would go see and heere them. They prepared the lodging of the Golden Chamber, whereas the King and Duke might see and not be seene. There was a most tragickall cause pleaded, whereof the first President made choise: The subiect was of one Iohn Prost a Practitioner of the Law, who had bene murdered at Paris, and the authors could not bee discovered. His Mother accused a Baker where he was lodged, vpon some apparant presumptions of certaine money which she had sent vnto him. VV herevpon the Baker was condemned to bee rackt with all extremity, after the which hee was enlarged for a time, putting in Caution for his appearance againe in Court. It happened afterwards that three Gascons were taken for robbing of a house, and condemned the next day to bee hanged. B At their execution, the last of the three sayd, that the Baker was innocent for that which he had bin accused of, for the murder of Iohn Prost, and that it was he with his companion la Sale that had slaine him, thinking that he had money: and that after they had slaine him, they did cast him into the priuy, whereas he was yet. The which was found true. Wherevpon the Baker being declared innocent, he presents his petition vnto the Court, and demands reparation of honor, with his Charges, Damage and Interest against the Mother. The Mother defends her selfe, and saith, that her accusations were not calumnious. Maister Anne Robert pleaded for the Baker; and for the Mother Maister Anthony Arnault; and for the Kings interest Maister Seruin his Maisties Aduocate Generall.

Anne Robert Aduocate in the Court, pleading for the Baker being Plaintife: said thus,

MAY IT PLEASE YEE.

THE ancient Poets taking pleasure to discourse of many Combats happened at the battell of Troy, report that Telephus (the sonne of Heracles) receiued in an encounter a sore wound with a Lance by Achilles: who seeing his paine to encrease dayly, fled to Apollons Oracle for Councell, who answered, That nothing could giue him ease or cure, but the same Lance wherewith hee had bene wounded. A Lance called Pedias of Mount Pelson, in the topp whereof Chiron gathered it, to present to Achilles: so as in Telephus accident, the Remedy & the Cure, came from the same Lance, which gaue the wound and did the harme.

The Plaintife with some like consideration, hath reason to say, that hauing bene by the authority of a sentence miserably tormented, and exposed to the rigour of the rack and torture, by the wilfull slander and importune rashnes of a Woman, he hath recourse vnto the same Lance of Achilles which did wound him: seeing that hee doth now appeale vnto the Authority & Iustice of the same Court, which hath heretofore giuen the first sentence of condemnation against him, hoping that by the exemplary punishment of the rashnes and slander of this Woman, the soueraigne Iustice of this Parliamēt, guided by the conduct of an Achilles, which doth preside & hold the chiefe place, shall giue cure to his wounds, and bring consolation to his griefes.

The estate of the cause that is now in question, and to be iudged, is not whether the Plaintife were falsely and slanderously accused or no: for the accident of two murderers hath auerred and discouraged the slander without any doubt. But the question is, if this Defendresse, (after so false and calumnious an accusation) shall passe unpunished: and whether her pretended excuses shalbe receiued and countenanced by Iustice. For one of the chiefe points which she pleads for her excuse is, that the Criminall Proccesse hauing past through the hands of the most famous Iudges of Europe, if they haue bin deceived (saith this woman) if by presumptions and probable coniectures, they haue found cause to condemne this Man vnto the rack, if so many worthy Iudges haue bin surprised, will you not excuse the simplicity of a Woman, and the extreme sorrow of an afflicted Mother for the death of her son, hauing had no hatred nor malice, in this accusation.

A accusation. It is a great abuse to measure the actions of Iudges, with the actions of Parties: the pursure and proceeding of parties is meere voluntary: no man is forced to plead or accuse: the Plaintife should be well aduised before he begin, & not to drawe any man into the danger of a capitall condemnation, if he be not first assured, that hee who he calls into question hath done the deed and is author of the crime: but the charge of a Iudge is tied to a necessary duty, bound to certaine Maximes, and subiect to rules, established by the Lawes to condemne necessarily vpon presumptions and proofes, and vpon the testimony of witnesses, examined at the instance of the party. Antiquity doth teach vs, that Tiresias that great Southsaier, foretold things to come by the flying of Birds, not that he did see the birds, for he was blinde, but (say the Poets) he had alwaies his daughter Manto nere vnto him, who told him in what manner the Birds did fly, & thereby he diuined. Iustice may rightly be compared to this excellent blinde man, & the comparison cannot seeme bad, seeing that the Egyptians thought good to paynt their Iudges with their eyes blindfold. For Iudges cannot rightly see nor knowe what doth passe. Iustice decrees nothing but according to the reporte and testimony of parties & witnesses. If any inconuenience happen in the condemnation, the mischiefe is to be imputed to the parties, and not to the Iudges or Iustice.

Iustice doth Iudge of that which appears.

They report that the Greekes hauing put Palamedes to death, his Father Nauplius to bereuenged, obserued the time when as the Greekes after the sack of Troy, returned by sea, in a great tempest, Nauplius being vpon a Rock in full sea, held a burning Torch in his hand, as if that place had bene a safe port for the descent of Ships: the Greekes abused with this light, ran against the Rock, and suffered shipwracke. In this misfortune if there were cause to complayne, it was against the malicious inuention of Nauplius; but as for the Pilots and such as gouerned the Shippes, they were not to be blamed, in following the direction of a Lanthorne in a darke night, being vually set at safe Ports. So in accidents like vnto this in question, all the harme, all the complaints, and all the wrong, is to be imputed to the accused, which kindles the fire of slander, and from whom proceeds the practices and subornation of witnesses; and the search and disguising of presumptions and circumstances. Who doubts but the complaints & malicious teares of this Woman were false directions, & sufficient inductions to circumuent the wisdom of the best Iudges, who in the midst of the night, that is to say, in the darknesse of hidden Crimes, haue followed the ordinary formes of Iustice.

Slander is the cause of false iudgment.

It was with reason that a Greeke Author discoursing of the criminall proccesse of Orestes, who to reuenge the death of his Father, slue Clitemnestra his Mother: sayd, that when he was brought before the Parliament of Arriopage, Minerva Goddess of Wisdom was President in Iudgment. The Ancients by such fictions would teach vs, that in the iudgement of Criminall causes, if a Celestiall power doth not assist, there doth many times inconueniences happen, but the fault must then be imputed to the accuser, who giues the first cause, by an information framed expressely to assist and condemne an innocent. Appian in his History reports of Iulius Caesar, that seeing a mutiny in his Campe, he commanded the authors thereof to be apprehended. A souldiar was brought before him as one of these mutines, & yet it was presently auerred that he was none. Caesar caused him that brought him to be seuerly punished, iudging that although hee did it not maliciously, yet he deserued punishment, for that he had drawne an innocent souldiar in danger of his life. We read that Martian hauing found a dead body in the night, & through piety (which was the greatly recommended among Christians) seeking to bury him, was taken, led before the Iustice, & condemned vpon suspicion: but at the same instant, when as they caried him to execution, it chanced happily that the Murderer was taken and executed, hauing confessed the fact to the great happines of Martian, who was deliuered, and within few yeares after chosen Emperour. As also the Ecclesiasticall History doth teach vs, that S. Athanasius was accused to haue slue Arsenius, and was ready to bee condemned, if by good happe Arsenius had not bene found, being hidden by the enemies of Athanasius. A late Writer curious in the search of the singularities of the History of Venice, reports an Aduenture somewhat like vnto this: Fuscarus sonne to the Duke of Venice, had a capital Martian con-

suspicion.

1600. capitall quarrell with an other Venetian Gentleman called Hermolaus Donat. This Gentleman was found dead, and the author of this murther not knowne. Fuscarnus vpon suspicion of their quarrell, was called in question, condemned and sent into exile where he died for griefe, to see himselfe banished from his Country. Within three moneths after his death, a theefe was executed, who amongst other crimes, confessed, that it was he and not Fuscarnus, which had slaine that Venetian Gentleman. In such and the like inconueniences, were it reason to giue absolute impunity, to him that was the Calumniator? be it that malice or indiscretion hath drawne him to this slander? Scipio said, that a Generall of an army must be well aduised what he doth, for in matters of Warre there is no meanes to erre twise, the first fault being sufficient to ruine an Army. Euen so in Iustice, it must be very exact, when there is any question of a capitall accusation, for seeing that the life depends thereon, there is no meanes to erre twise, the first being irreparable. It is an approued distinction of all those that haue treated of the punishment of false accusations, whether an Informer be induced to accuse slaundrously and wickedly, or by indiscretion and without mallice.

The punishment of false accusations.

The one differs from the other, so haue they diuers effects: the one hath some excuse, the other is punished seuerely: the one Ciuilly, the other Criminally: for where there is mallice and slander, the Law of God doth punish the Calumniator with the like paine, Lege Talionis: and at Rome the Calumniator in crimes that were not capital, was beaten with a hot iron, and branded in the forehead, for a signe and perpetuall marke of his slander. And the Emperour Macrinus did punish those accusers which did faile in their proofes with death. Phlyne speaking of such men, called them abominable sacrifices, which should be offered vp to the publike quiet. And the good Emperour Traian did so detest Calumniators, as hee caused them to be put into a ship without sayle or racking, abandoning them to the mercy of that mercilesse element, which would haue no pittie of them, no more then they had had of many poore innocents.

But as for the Slander which proceeds from indiscretion without mallice, the seueritie in truth should not be so great, yet is it fit there should be some punishment. No seuerer or capitall punishment, but at the least pecuniarie and ciuil, of domages and fine. If she were not excusable as a Mother, forced to accuse by extreme griefe without mallice: what racke? what punishment? what torments were sufficient to punish her, which hath drawne an innocent man in question, and in danger to bee broken vpon the wheele? The Poets saie, that the Goddesse Ceres by the supposition of Tantalus did eate Pelops shoulder. This Goddesse finding her own error, although vnadvisedly, condemed her selfe to make Pelops a new shoulder of Iuorie. You are the cause of the cruell torments which the playntife hath suffered vpon the racke, but you say it was by indiscretion, and without mallice. At the least by an award of domages and fine, make some Pecuniarie recompence, to releue the miserie of this poore man, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of his dayes, languishing after so many torments. And if this woman represents vnto you the pittie and griefe of a Mother, imagine I pray you the miserable sightes of this innocent, in the midst of the cruelty of the most violent tortures, hauing no other feeling but his paine and griefe. In one houre a thousand deaths without dying, a bodie tormented, stretched, halfe torne in peeces, his sinewes dried and strayned, his members broken, and his whole bodie in a pittifull estate, being bound, and miserably racked. And to speake truth, it had bin a great happiness for this poore man to haue died, for what remaines, is no more a perfect body, but peeces displaced and disioyned, members broken, lame and feeble, hauing his bodie reduced to that miserable estate, as hereafter he shall hardly by his labour, get a liuing for himselfe, his Wife, and five Children. It is the clamor and sightes of these poore yong Infants, whose erie pierceth vp to heauen, and their complaints come vnto you, to moue you vnto pittie. He in the meane time seeing himselfe miserable in his body, F and his family reduced to beggerie, liues and dyes altogether. It is a paine which still encreaseth, a Griefe which euer doubles, and a Death which neuer end.

That great Painter Apelles meaning to paint Slander, set him forth in a mourning wee'd

A weed, hauing two Vines, one of either side, Ignorance and Suspition: what reason were there to take for payment, an auaylable satisfaction, the indiscretion of the Defendresse, and the excuse of Ignorance, (an ordinary companion to Slander) and to pardon to norable a fault, vnder pretext of an afflicted Mothers griefe, for the death of her sonne: and hereafter when any Murther is committed, shall it bee lawfull for a Father, a Brother, or a neerer Kinsman, with all Impunitie, vnder a pretext of Iustice, to accuse whome he pleaseth, and to bring him in question of his life, or of some cruel torments, and in the end to be quit, excusing himselfe vpon his Griefe, or Ignorance. The rules of Iustice and Law doe not allow it. Titus Linius sayd excellently, that the Law was Inexorable, Deafe without Pittie, and without Passion. Why doth that worthy Author say, that the Law is deafe, but for that it doth neuer giue eare vnto the vaine discourse of Pittie and Commiseration? The propertie of Iustice is to bee strict and seuerer. The Surgion that is pittifull, and doth not lanch deepe, makes the wound incurable. An Indulgent & ouer-milde Father, makes the Child incorrigible: So a mercifull Iudge doth nourish and increase vice, and betrays the Lawes and Maiestie of Iustice.

The Lawe inexorable.

This cause doth therefore import the Publike, for examples sake: for although the Playntife hath no other quality but of a simple Bourges and handy-crafts man, yet to obtaine reason in Iustice, and to hope for reparation of the wrong which hath beene done him, he thinks himselfe great enough, seeing he hath the happinesse to liue vnder the peacetull gouernment of the best King in the world, who hauing heaped all happinesse vpon France, mainteynes equally in his protection and vnder the safeguard of his Maiesty, the life and health of all his subiects, Poore and Rich, Great and Small.

The Ancients held, that Themis, which is the Goddesse of Iustice, was the daughter of the Sunne: and as the Sunne may be seene in a Glasse by them which cannot behold his beames. So the Maiesty of our great King, the true and comfortable Sun of this monarchy, the eye and heart of France, would giue authority to this famous Parliament, as the true leate of his greatnesse, to the ende that therein as in a Looking-glasse, we might admire the Beauty, Light and Beames of his Iustice. An Historian sayth, that the Emperour Augustus had fire eyes, igneos oculos, inferring thereby that he had such glistering eyes and such a piercing sight, as it was impossible, or very hard to looke stedfastly on him. And we in like sort mult content our selues that it is lawfull for vs to admire the beauty of this soueraigne Court, and to beleue that our weaké sight is not strong enough to inioy fully the presence of our great Prince, sitting in his seat of Iustice, nor to indure the glistering beames of the Maiesty of our great French Augustus whom God hauing led through so many dangers, as it were by the hand, to the height of all greatnesse, and hauing endued him with the Valour of Cesar, the Fortune of Alexander, the Bounty of Traian, we can wish no more vnto him but the happines, the many yeares, and the continuall prosperity of Augustus, to the end that all we his subiects may liue happy and content vnder the raigne of so great a King and the assured Iustice of this famous Parliament.

So the Playntife hauing recourte to this soueraigne Iustice, as to the last Port of health, beseecheth the Court to allow of his Request, and that he may be absolved of the slanderous accusation layde against him, that the inrolement of his imprisonment may bee razed, and hee discharged of all condemnations which heretofore haue beene giuen; and moreover that the Defendresse may be condemned to a pecuniary reparation, such as it shall please the Court to decree, and to all Charges, Domages and Interest.

Afflictions
speake of themselves.

YOV shal vnderstand in this cause, how true it is: That ordinarie afflictions speake with iudgement, and that extreme calamities do quench or confound the spirit. The Plaintiffe, hath represented his griefes vnto you in an eloquent discourse, full of Arre & the force of eloquence: And contrariwise of our part, you shall heare nothing but the Sobbs and Sighes, of a Mother transported with greefe, and reduced to all sorts of despaire. I would to God the torments whereof you speake, and all the cruelties that may be imagined, had bene executed vpon me poore Mother, who haue one foote already in the graue: And that the death of my Sonne (and the Kinde of death, more miserable then the death it selfe) had not ministred the mournfull subiect of this miserable cause, so as on what side soeuer you turne, there is nothing to be seene but Teares & Desolation. But there is this great difference: that the greefe of the aduerser party (if there yet remains any), may be mollified in time, by a thousand remedies which excellent wits haue inuented during many ages, to ease the discomodities of the body. But contrarywise the extreame affliction (which findes no words of force to represent it), for the losse of a Sonne, of an onely Sonne, the onely support and comfort of the trembling age of an olde Mother, hath neuer found consolation in all the most excellent discourses in the world, being the onely phisicke of the minde. The Greefe is so violent as it exceeds all Remedy, and bleeds a fresh euery day. The older it growes, the more greuous it is. It doth hourly master the resistance which it found in the beginning, and doth continually vanquish the forces of the Body with them of the Minde.

It is a strange thing that my poore Sonne hauing bene thus cruelly massacred, you who see him returne no more into your house, instead of aduertising me thereof, went into his Chamber to take his money, you transported it out of your owne house, and hid it in your Brother in Lawes. And which is worse, being examined by the Iustice, you denied it constantly and often, vntill that your Sonne (to young to conceale the truth) discovered the place where you had layed it. All this is iustified by the Processesse, the which remains in the hands of the Kings Councell.

So as it was not in you that these Murtherers were not vnpunished, but the piercing eye of Diuine Iustice, which neuer sleeps: for a robbery committed two months after hath brought them to the execution. It appeeres by the informations, that the very day of the Murther, these two Murtherers went into your lodging, and brake open my Sonnes coter, if you had fled vnto Iustice, they might haue bene instantly apprehended. As peradventure my poore Childe was not then fully dead. Howe many are left for dead which are not so? Howe many haue bene taken out of the Coffin, yea out of the Graue, which haue suruiued their Funeralls fiftie yeares?

At the least you cannot denie but you were the cause to moderate their punishment, what know I what they would haue sayd vpon the wheele? you neuer attempted any thing against mee, but when as they which slue my Sonne could no more accuse you? What did then hinder you, why you did not speedely aduertise the Iustices? At the least it was feare to restore the money which you had taken, in committing a Domestickall theft: the which was alwaies, punished with death; and wherein the Lawes of Hospitality (the which are Holy among all Nations) were also violated. Whome should I sooner challenge for the death of my Sonne, then him, who had his spoiles? Nature hath hidden in the earth both gold, silver and iron, but the malice of Man hath drawne them all forth, that it might want no instruments for Murthers, nor reward for Murtherers. No man sheddeth blood, to die his hands therein; there must be some other violent passion to thrust him on: Couetousnesse is the most ordinary. All conjectures, all presumptions, were and are found true, that my Son had bin slaine by some one that desired his money, whom then might I better call in question then him who was found teized thereon?

If reading vnder foote the Murther of my Sonne (as some Mothers do) I had onely demanded his goods of you, you could not haue auoyded a unanimous and rigorous condemnation. But for that I haue sought reuenge of the Murther, I am this day in danger to bee condemned, what recompence? Catus Antonius was accused for the Conspiracy of Cathin: whereof he was found innocent, but his innocent was intermixt with other thefts, which he had in former times committed in Macedonia, for the which he was condemned. And yet the one of his accusations had nothing common with the other. In this cause Murther and Theft haue great advantage. How many bee there in this great City, which being murdered like to this poore Youngman, should remaine three monthes vnknewne, if their Hosts wanting them, did not presently aduertise the Iustice. Suffer them to take their money without punishment, that is to say, declare him innocent that hath hidden it, and you shall hope to hide the Murtherers.

It is a strange thing that in the head City of this Realme, and in the face of the Parliament, there should be such furious Tigers found, to murder men who die as in the most hideous forest in the world. The more these wicked engines are condemned to condemn the Lawes, the more must you endeavor to forestall them. All that may serue to punish such detestable crime, must be done with secrecy, that it may can so much aduance it, as to auerete the Iustice speedely, which is the best way to reuel spirits are terrified and amazed. It shall be like vnto the Parliament, which may bee rotten before they know he is dead.

There be some that are incident to the suspicion of a crime, till one that be very innocent, as he that is found neere vnto a man that is newly Murdered. He may happily be put to the Racke, this is a meere misfortune, or rather (sayng a fictionality obserued in this case by the Heathen Lawiers) let vs say with the Doctors of the Church, that it is a secret iudgement of God, the which we cannot see, and not curiously serch into. The Thunder is Worshipped euen by them that are stricken with it: Punishments ordayned by Iustice are the chastisements of Gods hand, whole Poore is represented here below by the Prince, and His by his Magistrates. The Philosopher Crator, sayd, that hee which suffers all without desert, is much eated in this accident of fortune. But in this fact which is now in question, the Plaintiffs theft and not his misfortune, hath with great reason made this suspicion to fall vpon him.

Do you not consider that the paine which you haue suffered, is the cause you shall be it is day ablated? Without it your theft could not remaine vnpunished, nor demand of damage and interest, belongs onely to them that are meere innocent, if you bee accused of two faults, and are found guilty of one, you must implore the mercy of the Iudge and not his rigour.

It was then impossible to free you from the Racke, by all the Maximes of Lawyers, and their Interpreters, followed by a Decree which needes no other defence then Reason. And not to strate from this cause, shall I let you plainly see, that you neede not bee so fearefull to come to the Racke. If these Murtherers had not bene tortured for the robbery for the which they were executed, they could not haue bene condemned for want of prooffe. The one of them confessed vpon the Racke. As the Racke tormented you, so the Racke releued you, hauing discovered your innocency in regard of the Murther. And in easing you, it hath brought before mine eyes my Murdered Sonne, who presents himselfe euery night vnto mee with stretched out armes, whilst the Murtherers kill him.

So as one and the selfe same thing hath filled me with Heauinesse, and you with Ioy. Comfort your selfe then with your good Fortune, and insult no moreouer my misery: do you not feare that they will lesse pity you, and the paine you haue endured, when they shall see you haue none of mee, nor of my distresse. I will not say vnto my Matters

1600. that it is cruell and barbarous to add afflictions to the afflicted, why should I see-feeling that all the condemnations which my aduerser partie demands against mee, ad-no more to my calamitie, then small brookes doe vnto the Sea? It is the onely comfort which remaynes in my miserie, that it can haue no increase. I will not therefore spend any time to cyte the texts of Lawiers, which hold the violent passions of a miserable a Mother, excusable. They be Lawes which are borne with vs, where no man can be ignorant, seeing we haue suckt it with our Mothers milke, and which wee cannot abrogate but in spoyling our Humanitie. I will not strine to represent vnto you that affection to the Children, or to the Parents, (euens as the loue of good Subjects to their Prince,) consist not in any mediocrity or temper, but in excess, that excess which in other motiues of the mynd is vicious, is herein the full of ail perfection. Why should I come to these excuses, seeing that if I were to begin my Accusation, I would doe no lesse then I haue done? I had rather bee condemned to all sorts of Damages, Interests, and Reparations, then to repent mee of the pursure I haue made for the death of my Sonne.

A mothers passions excusable.

A goodly pretext for those Mothers, which doe every day sell the deare blood of their Children, when they shal heare that I haue bin condemned, shal they not then haue reason to say that they feare Damage and Interest, if they open their mouthes?
 Dion obieries that they were reduced to that point at Rome, hauing so much discour-tenanced accusations, as they were forced to promise Impunity to him that should con-uict an other of a greater crime then his own. Calumniators and false accusers are to be feared vnder bad Princes, which enrich themselves with the confiscations of their Subjects, and not vnder the iust and flourishing gouernment, of our great King, which hath erected for many euerslasting trophies of his Clemencie and Bountie, equalling at this time by the glorious effects of Iustice (which shines throughout all this great and mightie Estate) the victories and the stately triumphes of fearefull warre: showing by the effects, that the same Vertue, and the same Magnanimitie carries great Princes and excellent Captaines into the midst of the most blodie and furious battayles, and doth conduct them alio to the holy and sacred actions of most happie and blessed Peace.

Talions Law wholly abrogated.

Wee haue then no need amongst vs of these Talions punishments, the which were as soone Abrogated, as they were Inacted. If they were in force, not two crimes amongst a hundred should bee punished: at the beginning wee must necessarily follow coniectures and presumptions, If they may lead vs to the certaine knowledge of the truth: they condemne the culpable, if not they forbear: God onely walks in light, but men in darkenesse. But I beseech you to consider what power I haue had in ail this Criminall proceeding. The Plaintife begins his action against mee, because I am the most weake. If hee durst challenge the Iudges, hee would doe it much more willingly, ail the instruction of the Proceffe comes from the Crimi-nall parte. It is not I, but the Kings Atturney generall. Alas I brought nothing but my sighes: therein consists my cryme. Oh I may well double my teares, seeing it is not lawfull for mee to weepe: it were more then a second losse of my Sonne to lose my teares.

The Plaintifs intent is to haue againe for his damage and interest, the money which Iustice hath forced him to yeeld. I haue it not, I haue beene employed in praying vnto God for my Sonne who was cruelly murdered, and had no time to thinke of his soule, which was a double crueltie. Howses shake before they fall.
 The smoake fore-tels the fire that will consume vs. A Tempest is discovered a far off, but the murdering hand of man strikes sodenly, when wee least thinke of it. If you condemne mee in Damages and Interests, you may iudge that remembering his paynes, how rigorously hee will intreat mee. I haue nothing left to pay it, that little which I had was employed in the education of my Sonne, holding it to bee the richest and cheefest treasure that I could desire: O deceitfull hope! By vertue or

A of your sentence he will confine me into a Prison, but I regard it not, so as hee make choise of a darke and a hidious one, that it may soone shorten my miserable life, the which shall neuer find ease but in death: for I am resolu'd to passe the remainder of my dayes, like vnto those Mothers which accompanie their Children vnto the Graue.
 All that makes me to desire Libertie, is to the end that I might liue among the Rockes, in deserts and the most solitarie Woods, and that I might neuer see Mothers that make much of their Children. Alas my Sonne, my poore Sonne, I shall call out thee night and day, although thou answerest me not. If this extreame miserie doth not sa-tisfie the Plaintife, let him feare, and apprehend the wrath of God and a second B punishment. Let him not abuse the grace which he hath done him, in making manifest the truth of this Murther. Let him liue happily to see his innocencie knowne: and I alwayes vnhappy to haue lost my poore Child. I conclude that it would please the Court to absolue me from his request.

After this the Kings Solliciter General, master Servin, did rise to plead and conclude for the Atturney Generall, vpon that which the Solliciters had deliuered for the parties: the opinions of the hearers were in such suspence, as they knew not which way to incline. He that had first heard for the Plaintife, sayd, that he had reason: but as Iudges must alwayes reserve one eare for the defender, being impossible to iudge definitiue-ly vpon the discourses of one partie. when the second had pleaded, there was such an equalitie and concurrence of reasons found, as it seemed they had both a good cause.
 C The Kings Solliciter discours, was the poulder to separate the truth from that which had some apparance of truth: but let vs heare this other Demosthenes of France, whose pleading followeth.

The defenders conclussion

L. S E R V I N: for the Kings Atturney General said thus.

MAY IT PLEASE YEE.

IF it be true, according to the worthy saying of Statius Catilins (vsed by Apuleius) defending himselfe against an accusation of impietie: That innocency is true eloquence.
 D it might satissie the intention of the poore Playntifes, and might promise them an honorable issue, for that a Poore and vntainted life speaking for them, surmounts in the opinion of good men, the richest eloquence of them that are Guiltie. For hee may well defend, that can purge himselfe from crymes, hauing done nothing but what he dare publickly auow. But if it be more true that the art of speaking be Ver-tue and Wisedome, as the Stoicks haue defined it: signifying thereby that the vertuous and wise haue subiect enough to talke: It is most certaine that God, which giueth Wisedome, and out of whose mouth proceeds all knowledge and vnderstanding, hauing not endued the Plaintifes with such graces, seeing they haue neither the knowledge nor word, which is drawne out of the holy Scriptures, nor the perswasive speech E of humane Wisedome, hauing not the refined discourse of Reason, they had great need of the assistance of their Solliciter: who as hee doth not yeeld in Eloquence and knowledge to any one of his profession, hath made prooffe by this present action, how well he can defend the innocent, the which is so much the more commendable, for that Dionysius Halicarnassens (a great iudge of Orators) did hold Plato worthie to be blamed for that he had written the Appologie of Socrates in a flat and cold stile.

On the one side, Maister Anne Robert hath liuely represented vnto you, the miserable estate of the Baker and his wife, lately accused, and now Plantifs: how they haue beene pursued in the Chasteler, iudged and appealed, and condemned by sentence, the Husband put to the torture, and the racke presented to the Wife, and to her Maide: and to conclude, al the family in trouble, by the accusation of a horrible Murther, pretended F to be committed vpon the persō of his guest: a crime which God hath made knowne by the reuelation of the Murther, that the hearts and hands of these poore people were innocent. By reason whereof they demand reparation of Honor, with Damage and Interest

1600. terest against the Accuser. You haue on the other side, heard Maister Anthony Proff, for the Mother of the deceased Iohn Proff, miserably murdered, being before Plaintiffe, and now accused of Slander, who may well defend her selfe, by the simple colour of Piety, which cries and is intercessor for her, for her I say: A Mother whose affliction is such, as there is no tongue but the Mothers, or rather the voyce of GOD that can well expresse it. neyther can any Aduocate or Orator how excellent foueuer, vnlesse he be possessed with a diuine spirit, represent the passions of a Mother: witnesse the Prophet, when he deliueres what God had sayd. Can the Mother forget her child, but she must haue pity of the fruit of her wombe? and if she should forget it, I will not forsake him saith the Lord. It is God our common father, God who is charity it selfe, for so he is called by one of his Apostles: God of whom the Greeke Poet Aratus (honoured by the allegation of S. Paul) sayd, That we are his offspring. God of whom the same Apostle doth teach vs, That he is father of Heauen and Earth. It is hee by whom all Mothers haue their affection to their children. It is hee by whom the Defendencie (a miserable Mother was encouraged to seeke & pursue reuenge for the blood of her child. Behold persons of diuers qualities in our cause, who pretende their innocencies by different reasons. The Baker and his wife demand reparation, being ignorant of the Murder of Proff: and the Mother (of Proff murdered) seeks to be freed from the imputation of slander. But there is yet an incounter in this controuersie, which regards the authority of things iudged, wherein the publike hath an interest. To deliuer what is fit vpon euery one of these qualities, it seemes expedient to obserue what hath past in the accusation, and pceedings; the first iudgement in the decree, the execution and what followed since.

That which appeares by the Proccesse iudged, is, that the deceased Iohn Proff, sonne to the Accuser, hauing bene lodged for a time in the Bakers house: About the beginning of February 1599, Katherine Cordier the Wife of the Baker, sent for a Locksmith by her husbands Sonne, and caused him to open the Chamber of Proff being absent, the which she hath confessed after much disguising of the boies name, whom since she knew to be her sonne in lawe. After this ouerture there was another made in the view of two vnkowne men, who brought the Keys which the sayd Proff had given them: the which is a second charge; for these two men entred into the Chamber in the presence of the Hostesse, and tooke what they pleased of that which Proff had left: and yet afterwards there was a third opening made by the Locksmith, which was brought by the Sonne of the Baker, & by his wifes commandement, this beeing thus aduowed and iustified by the sonne: The Chamber being opened the fourth time by a Committary of the Cheseler, there was some money found, belonging to Proff; but not all, for that the Baker and his Wife had taken and promised some to their Maide, if she said nothing. Moreover *Proff*s apparell being in his Coffer, and among the rest a Dubler, the Hostesse being examined, sayd that Proff had none other. In the end the Proccesse hauing bin made perfect by intergatories & confrontations. One of the cheete allegations made by the Husband and the Wife for their iustification was, that the Accuser although a Mother, did not loue Proff her Sonne, whereof he had often complained. By a sentence given by the Prouost of Paris it was decreed, that the Baker, his Wife and Seruant, should be put to the Rack. They appeale. There followed a second decree in regard of the Baker; & as for his Wife and seruant, it was ordained they should haue the Rack presented vnto them, the which was done. And after the deniall of the Baker, his Wife and Mayde, there followed another sentence allowing the receipt of the ordinary Proccesse, and yet restrained that in case no greater proofs being found on the ordinary Rack, The accused should preuaile, yet the should haue no Charges, Damage nor Interest iudged vnto them. In Iune following, God hauing suffered that 2. theues, whereof the one called Iohn Bazana had murdered this Proff, were apprehended by the Iustice and by the testimony of Bazana, the act was confessed. So as the Baker & his Wife pretend themselves freed by this testimony, & demand an honourable reparation, with some recompence from the Mother of him that was murdered, saying that the accusation being false, she ought to be iudged a slanderer.

Wherein

1600. A wherein it seemes that Innocency presents it selfe at the feete of Iustice, and cries out for them as Dauid in the 7. Psalm intitled Siggaion, that is to say: The ignorance of Dauid, the which is his defence against the slanders of Semei, where he exclaymed in denying and fortifying the Impositions of his aduersary, and in saying that he knewe not what it was, he spake these words. If I haue committed such a fact, if there be iniquity in my hands, that I may fall before mine enemies. Excellent words and deliuered in the kind of an oath. In like case a poore Host plaintiffe, complaines and may say with Agur the Sonne of Iake Truly I am more brutish then any man whatsoeuer, I haue no vnderstanding, neither haue I learned any wisdom, nor attained to the knowledge of holy things. The wit of man will maintaine the infirmity thereof, but who will support a greened minde. The Accuser at the first seemed iust in her cause: but the Accused come to purge themselves and haue found out the truth. The Words of slanderers (saith the wise King) are ambushes of blood, but the mouth of Truth shall deliuer them. You see an Host and Hostesse accused of Inhospitality, of Infidelity, and of the Murder of their Guest, a crime so far from the manners and hearts of the French, as if Euripides staid among the Grecians.

That it was not for the Achæans to murder their guests.

We may say with the Plaintifs, with as much or more reason, That it is not vsuall among the French to murder their guests, for among Ciuill people our Caltike nation hath bene most renowned for Hospitality, a vertue proper to the French and celebrated by many Strangers: yea by Parthenius a Greeke Author in his booke of the Affections of Loue, where he saith in the History of Eurippus, that at what time the Gauls made roads into Ionia, the Celts receiued their guests willingly and intreated them courteously. The which is confirmed by Saluianus a Preeft of Marseilles, in his booke of the providence of God, where among the vertues of our Nation, hee termes them Francois hospitales. It was therefore a great crime, vnfit for the Plaintifs: A crime for Barbarians Pagans and Infidells, worthy of extraordinary punishment, and so much the more punishablen, for that it had bene committed in Paris, the chiefe City of the Realme, the seat of our Kings, the Place of soueraigne Iustice, whereas the most Hoily and Reuerent Senate of the world is resident: The Court of Peeres, and the great Parliament of our great King.

The Husband accused in this Parliament, and not onely accused, but iudged and tormented in Body and Minde, comesthis day in Iudgement as a man reuiued againe, by his innocency, he brings his wife with him, and saith against the Accuser. That he which slandereth his neighbour is like vnto a false witness which is as a hammer, as a sword, as a sharpe arrowe. Although he be borne poore and miserable, yet is he of a pure & innocent life. That his Soule and that of his Wiues are no lesse precious before God then the richest: that they haue not wronged any man: that they haue liued content in their poverty (Pouerly which is a singular gift of God and vnkowne of men) & yet they being poore, and innocent haue bene afflicted: a thousand feares haue seized on them, and the life both of the Husband and Wife haue bene in danger. The Sonne hath bene heard against the Father, all the family defamed, fearing to loose their credit and to see no more good daies: to haue no meanes to get their liuing, nor to shewe themselves. The troublesome greefe of a mournfull prison, deprived of light, and cast into an obscure dongeon fit for Murderers: To liue often-times, & to die as of ten. The Rack given vnto the Husband & presented to the Wife: all danger, all greefe: their eyes dried vp, their mindes oppressed, apprehension of Nakednes, Hungar and Death, yea and of as ignominious death. They demand this Day, that which the Men vnjustly tormented in the Iustice of Athenes demanded: that the Altar of mercy might be adorned with a monument, carrying a declaration of their innocency. They demand moreover pretend reparation against the Accuser, and this demand is not newe nor strange: there are many Presidents of the like, among the which there is one very famous in the Declarations of Marcus Seneca the Rethorician.

1600. A Father hauing two Sonnes, goes into a farre Countrie with one of them, the sonne returns alone: his Brother accuseth him of Parricide: he is condemned, but by reason of some festiuall daies the execution is deferred: the Father returns, the Brother condemned accuseth his Brother of false witnesse: obtaines Iudgement, causeth him to be bound, and deteines him according vnto the Lawe, which sayd, that a false witnesse should be prisoner to him whom hee had falsly accused. The innocent Brother sayd, that the Accuser was the cause of Parricide in the person of his Father, and had committed one, in that of his Brother: the Minister of Iustice had giuen notice vnto the condemned Brother of the comming of his Father: the expected punishment was more greuous then death. It was more troublesome for the condemned Man to apprehend it, then to endure it: he layd before his eyes all kinds of Death. And what can I lesse doe (saied this innocent,) then keepe him in my bonds, that might haue taken away my life? In another famous example, we see an other controuersie in the same Author. A Father hauing two Sonnes, deliuer the one into the others hands, vpon suspicion of Parricide, whereof his Mother in Lawe accused him. The accused Brother is cast into an vnrig'd Shippe. God preferres him from danger: he falls into the hands of Pirates, and is made their Captaine.

The Father makes a voiage by sea; he is taken by the Sonne, whom he had so ill intreated, and the Sonne sends him home into his Country. Cestius Pius an eloquent man sayeth for the innocent Brother. That innocency is a strong fort, and a faithfull safegard in danger. The Sea compassed in the Shippe, the waues cost it: the Tempest draue it, yet innocency did assure him. O Sea more iust then their Iudgement! O Waues more mild then the Father! what a soule haue you cast into the Port! and you haue not onely saued the Sonne, but you haue deliuered him into the hands of Pirates: it was diuinely decreed that the Father should vnder take a voiage, that the Iudge should bee taken to repent him of his Iudgement. A Mother in Lawe might accuse, yea and cause her Husbonds Sonne to bee condemned of Parricide, but she could not make him a Parricide, no nor in condemning him. The Sonne here vpon saied vnto the Father, Behold my innocency O father in the sea, which you would not knowe in your house. and then turning vnto the Iudges hee saied. I had rather haue mine innocency iustified vnto you, then vnto my father. Here vpon Aristotle sayeth that by the Lawe of Greece they gaue the right side to the accused. And by the Romaine Lawes, Iudges are taught to be more inclined to absolue then to Condemne.

If this bee requisite in Ciuill causes, howe much more in Cryminall: And the Mother which was the Accuser, whome the Demanders say was ill affected to her Sonne when hee liued, could she without feare of punishment, slander the Complaynants, charging them with the vncertaine suspicion of a murther committed vpon the person of her Sonne, so much hated, or at the least not much beloued of her.

That if the Demanders be not exempt from faults, wherevnto all men are subiect: yet they may iustifie themselves free from the Crime imposed vpon them by the Accuser, being this day purged by a testimonie which God hath caused to bee giuen by a Man, the which is so much the more credible, for that hee Deposited it neere vnto his death, not speaking to discharge himselfe, but accusing himselfe and confessing the Murther. These (in sorte) bee the griefes which the Demaunders can propound. It being hard, yea impossible in such cases to speake words that may equall the sorrowe.

Contrariwise the Defendresse a poore Mother, saith, or crieth out in that sort, as it is not well possible to represent her passion: but we must paint it out, as Timanthes did counterfite Iphigenia: With her face covered, a Lowe voice and a Languishing speech. who cannot make you vnderstand what shee hath suffred and doth yet suffer. Shee hath lamented her absent Sonne, euen when as shee accused the Complaynants: shee thought him to bee dead: her feare was grounded vpon presumptions, the which which not onely the first, but the last Iudges haue held to be repugnant. A voyce was heard from on high, the Mother weeping for her Sonne, & would not bee comforted. Doubtlesse no kinde of affection or commiseration is like vnto that of a Woman, but amongst Women, none so great as that of a Mother. So as GOD hath compared the remembrance which he hath of Man to that of a Mother. And in truth, Mothers haue more then a Fatherly remembrance. Our Defendresse in this case is assisted by the surrages of Nature: three sighes vpon Earth, and fills Heauen with her complaynts: her lamentable cries, and her abundance of teares, are her only defences: the which are so much the better, for that they are naturall. A Mother who knowes not whether to go, who findes no place to rest in, who seeks her Child as if he were yet liuing: who would haue endured his wounds; and desired to see that shee did not before her Sonne: she implors Heauen in lamenting her misery, and desires her end: her sighes moue all men to compassion. Griefe hath seized vpon her soule, and her vnderstanding is nothing else but Sorrow. Nothing is more constant then the loue of the Father to his child, & especially of Fathers that haue the instinct of Nature. But mothers haue their affectiōs more violent. If any thing happen vnto their children, it breedes a great alteration in them. Vnto the iudgement of Solomon, seeking betwixt two Women, to know the right Mother. So yu may see the passion of David when hee called his Sonne, My Sonne Absalon my sonne: he was much troubled. But Mothers are much more, feeling the same paine they suffered at their birth. And that which afflicts the Deten here much more, is that they Complaynants, object against her, that shee loued not her Child. That without doubt is insupportable to a Mother. The latter times are miserable, foretold by the Prophets: That Inhumanity, Incivility, Attorie (that is to say want of loue in the Parents vnto their Children, and of Children vnto their Parents) should enter into the hearts of men. What say I of Men, who are no Men, seeing they proue Inhumane, Cruell, Brutish, and Vnnaturall.

But can it be, that two such contrary passions should intempe in our Defendresse? Could she hate her Son, and not feeling him any more, complaine that he was dead? Could she accuse his Host & Hostesse if shee loued him not? Iosephus in his first booke of the Iewish War, reporting the accusation of Herode against his Children, sayth that Saturninus would not condemne the accused, saying, that it was not lawfull for him who had children to giue sentence of death against another mans children. A speech worthy of a graue Romaine, but had bene better spoken by one borne in Iulian, for in former times the Iudges giuen by God vnto the People, were chosen out of the fathers of families, who had, or had had Children, and who by this meanes knew best the true affections of Fathers loue. The History addees that an old Man at armes of Herods, called Tyron, was so transported seeing a cruell Father, as hee became almost madde, going to complaceto place, exclaiming, that, Iustice was troden vnder foote, Truth was perished, Nature confounded, and all was full of iniquity: with such like speeches as passion made him to vtter. So strange this good old Man held this Mallice, not beleueing that such neere Kinsmen should contpire against their owne blood. And therefore it is not to be presumed that our Defendresse being a Mother, was otherwise then well affected to her Sonne. and what greater proofe of her loue can bee giuen, then her accusation against the Complaynants. And who can represent the tender affection of Fathers and Mothers, which teale the resemblance of bodies, and munes, in the little admirable scale of the Infant, the Mothers being much more affectionate to that which proceeds from them then the Fathers? What then may bee sayd of the objection made vnto the Defendresse? Doubtlesse false allegations must concur with naturall, as Paulus the Lawyer sayth of Confessions: and it is not lawfull for Iudges, especially for such as are Fathers to beleue that a Mother would hate her Sonne to the death: especially this poore Woman, who making her complaint of the Murther, did note one notable circumstance, saying, that her Sonne had complayned vnto her, that the Demanders were fioward Hosts.

A Sonne whom she (being his Mother) teeming no more, came out with the Mother of Lamuel, What my Sonne, what the Sonne of my womb is called the Sonne of my bowes?

Prou. 31.

This poore Mother was perplexed: she sought her Sonne, and found him not. A Sonne which was but simple and might easily be wronged, for he went to get Money, hee left in his Chamber, which was a bayte for Thieves: his Mother himselfe lay as hand on it, the suffered men to enter into his Chamber: men whom she knew not. What might the Mother thinke of this? Had hee not reason to be troubled? flayne him. As much as was said in the booke of Valdome: But the Iustice of men is tedious shall deliuer them. It is also written. That the disloyall shall be taken for their money, and the wicked shall be the ranfome of the iust, and the disloyall for the righteous. And then this poore Woman thinke with reason, that you are not to haue any regard to the Demaunders, vnder colour of their base condition, seeing that for a pence of money, they would haue committed the deede, hauing taken their Chills money which satisfied them. These bee the reasons by the which the poore Mother may excuse her selfe, that shee hath not attempted any accusation, for the which shee should be charged with slander.

Prou. 18. v. 21

Let vs nowe come vnto the Iudges. They need no excuse, nor any defence of their Decree, then the authority of foueraigne Iudgements: yet we may say, for the time which they had of the proofes, if not full and cleare as the Noone day, yet they were such as the presumptions were vehement. If the accused iustred, it came from themselves, for they obserued not the precept which teacheth man: About all things his heart pure, from whence life proceeds. They haue applied their hearts to desire another mans goods, resembling those that erre: Either through want of instruction, or by their great indiscretion, or hauing their hearts pierced with the Dart of conuentionall sinne. And therefore it is no wonder if they haue not appeared in iudgement with a constant countenance. For blessings are vpon the head of the iust: but extorsions stoppe the mouth of the guilty.

Ibid. 5. v. 23

Ibid. 12. v. 11

Do you not see, that God was not with the accused? they were confounded in their owne speeches. Life and death are in the power of the tongue, hee that looses it shall esteeme himselfe thereof. They haue said too much, charging the Mother, which accused them, or hated their Sonne. And who will not beleue but the Iudges (seeing the Protestie) made their players vnto God to open their vnderstandings. The doubt which they had of the circumstances of the charge, hath bene fortified by examples, the which are the still encounters that come vnto the minde. In this City, a Woman dwelling neere to Suttons, was hanged with a Hammer, which two theeres had taken a Smith. I suppose, the Smith being condemned, he was put to the Racke. Afterwards the theeres were apprehended for other crimes, and freed: the Smith who was already executed. Iudges in coniectural causes, erre sometimes against their willes: being bound to follow the probable, for that which may happen, or hath happened. Sometimes there are bad Hints, Treacherous and murderers. It is dangerous said Phidias to beleue, but it is more dangerous not to beleue.

Pro. 17. v. 25

There is no reason then to heare the complaints of the Accused, against the Iudges: Wherein that which that wise King hath written, whose words are like vnto deepe springs which cannot be dried, and from whence we drawe profit for all affaires and especially for iudgements. To condemne the iust is not good, nor to strike Princes that haue carried themselves iustly. An excellent sentence, and agreeing with our cause. Hee called Iudges, Princes: and in another place they are termed Gods. That if God making his Iustice to shine, hath since discovered the Murther, yet hath not the Baker nor his Wife any cause to complaine of the Court. The eye of God intuseth his knowledge into the spirits of men, in such measure as he pleaseth, giuing vnto some a neerer light, (and as Synecius Bishop of Cyrene layd) more approaching vnto things which Awch he doth reueale, to others farther off. We take moysture from the Water, heat from the Fire, firmenes of the body from the Earth; & spirit from the Aire: but Iustice comes from God, who is the onely fountaine of all good. We haue not this Iustice in vs, be it for the good of our selues, or for the perpetuall and constant durie which wee owe vnto our neighbours, to doe euery man right. God onely knoweth all things, and all is hidden from vs, but what hee pleaseth. There is none but hee which knoweth hidden things. It is hee whose admirable name is aboue all other names. It is hee whom Daniell calleth a CERTAINE, (by the word Palmoni), of whom the admirable name of IEVS the Saviour of the world, was not reuealed, before that hee was made man. That Sonne of Iustice whose glorie is incomprehensible. It is hee who by his light both open the Iudges eyes when it pleaseth him: To the end they should take care of the innocent, and looke vnto his estate.

Iob. 22. 20.

It is written in the booke of the wise King: That euen as in the water one face is opposite to another, so doth the heart of man vnto man, so as oftentimes the Iudge discovereth the truth of a crime, by the face and countenance, as well as by the mouth of the Accused. And to that purpose the same King sayth That Councell in the heart of man is like vnto a deepe water, the which a wise man shall draw forth. But this doth not often happen, but vnto the King: of whom the wise man saith thus. There is no prophecy but in the Kings lippes, and his mouth shall not stray from Iustice. God giues this priuiledge to a iust King. God which is the onely searcher of hearts. There are many thoughts in the heart of man, but the onely Councell of our Lord God is firme. And therefore Saint Augustin in his booke of the Citie of God, in the Chapter which he hath exprelly made, touching the errors of humane Iudgements, makes a complaint of the perplexities whereunto Iudges are reduced: when to saue an Innocent, they are forced to condemne the accused vnto the racke, and for an vncertaine fact, they cause him to suffer a certaine paine. The which hee excusing saith: That a wise Iudge doing not things with a will to hurt, but by necessitie to iudge that which hee knoweth not, must cry vnto God: Deliuer mee from my extremities and cares. The which hee speakes not to blame the racke: for hee knowes it to be necessarie. But if it bee not (as we cannot rightly say) done by malice, yet is it a great miserie. And doubtlesse if it bee a mischeefe, yet is it well ordained, and by good Lawes which are practised in all Countries, whereas Iustice is well administered, whereof there are so many Statuts, not onely in this Realme, but in the Estates of Italie, and in the neighbour Countries, as in Piedmont, in Sauoy, and other parts of Christendome, as there is no reason to doubt thereof.

Neither is it lawfull to argue the Iudges of rigor in this cause, for besides the prescriptions which might moue them, who knowes whether the Accused had committed some other crime, whereof God would suffer this accusation, whereof the now complayne should be the punishment: There are some generations which thinke to be free, and yet they are not cleansed from their filthines. And what is hee that can say, I haue purged my heart, I am cleansed from my Sinne. If thou sayest, we did not know it, hee that weighs the heart shall not be vnderstanded: and reward euery man according to his workes. In another place the wise man saith that, Hee which walketh innocently shall be saued, but the peruerse, walking by two wayes shall fall. Aristotle speaking of the Iudges of Greece, sayd that they were accustomed before sentence, to sweare that they should iudge, by the best aduise they could conceiue. The which Demosthenes in his Oration against Aristocrates hath sayd, by the most iust aduise. In which case although the Areopagites did sometimes iudge (as one would say) against the Law, yet could they not bee reprehended to haue gone against the oath taken by them to iudge well, whether it were in the Senate, or in the Assembly which they call Hellas: no man being able to answere but for his owne conscience.

Pro. 30. v. 12.

And for this reason, by the Lawes of Charlemagne, & of Lewis the Debonair, our most Christiã Kings: It was not lawfull to blaspheme, that is to say, to accuse of false iudgement, or to blame the Earles, (which was the title of Iudges in France) if it did not appeare that they did 1599. did iudge either by enuie, or by some badoscaſion. To conclude, the Iudges which chose A great Princes called Fideles were held for good, and without blemish, when they were once, guided by the zeale of true Iustice. So the Demanders doe not complaine of the Iudges, but of the Accuſer, against whome if shee had framed her accusation maliciously, and vpon spleene, shee were then subiect to that which was decreed by the Capitulaire, which saith, That they which haue accused Innocents, either before the Prince, or before the Iudge, if they were spirituall men, they are to bee degraded, if they be lay men, they must bee condemned to the like punishment, which they should haue suffered that were accused. But this is to be vnderstood of accusations wherein there is malice, in which case the false and malicious Accuſers deserue that which the Accused suffered for the Slanderer resembles vnto the wicked; which are represented by the wife man. watching secretly for them. B cent, and persecuting him without cause. In which case, such as slander to vexce, and to get money: by the Constitutions of the Romaine Emperors, were punished with the same punishments.

It is therefore no reason that the Complaynants should trouble the defendresse for the accusation which shee hath made, seeing it was not with any intent of slander: but they must take their trouble as an accident sent of God, as a mischance which the Grecians called a Diuine Fortune. We must not vie the inhumanitie of Gneus Piso although he were an vpriight man, and free from many vices, but hauing not the true rule of reason, hee tooke rigour for a resolution of seueritie, who being aduertised that two Souldiars going forth together, the one was returned without his companion, hee condemned him as a murderer of him that was absent: and as the condemned man was in the hands of the Executioner at the place of Iustice, his companion (whome they held to be dead) returned: This rigorous Iudge hearing that the officer had pronounced the execution, he caused him to be apprehended, & to be brought vnto the scaffold, & with him the Companion, taking for a pretext that he was the cause of this mischance by his absence, and to him he added the officer, iudging him worthy of punishment, for that he had brought backe the first condemned, whome hee should haue presently executed according to the sentence. It is not fit in all causes, to stand so stilly vpon Iudgments: as Alexander the Great did, who had rather pay a fine for Athenodorus then remit it: for sometimes a temper of humanitie is commendable, as in this case: Imitating the example of Prince Titus, the Son of Vespasian, when hee deliuered Iosephus out of prison, saying vnto the Emperour his Father, after that hee had commended the prisoner to be vnbound: It is reason O Father, that with his bonds the dishonor should be taken from Iosephus, for he shall bee as if in the beginning he had not bene bound. But if we vnbind him, we must cut the chaine, for so they vse them that are uniuſtly bound. A speech of a worthie Prince, witnessed by the History of Iosephus, worthy to be spoken before a great King, and well approoued of by the Emperour: As true lippes please Kings and they loue him that speaks iust things with a pure heart.

22. 11.

And therefore to make an end of the Plaintiffs miserie with that of Iosephus, the Court if it please, hauing in some sort regard vnto their request, shall set them at Liberte, declaring them innocents of the cryme of hospitalitie violated, and of the murder whereof they haue bene accused, without aduſing vnto them (notwithstanding) any Reparation, Charges, Damages, and intereſts against the Accuſer, seeing shee hath not, nor cannot be iudged a Slanderer. So either partie obtayning what they may hope for by reason, things iudged shall remayne in their authoritie, and, God who holds the Kings heart in his hand as little brooks of running water, inclining to his will, shall make him raine happily, and his Posteritie after him, as all good Frenchmen and true Christians doe wish by a happie Marriage, so as our great Henry the fourth, sitting in the throne of Iustice, or represented by his Councillors, mayntaining his Countries shall disperse all danger by his looke: and euery one will say with Saloman, the wel beloued of God. That the seat of the King which iudgeth the poore iustly, shall bee firme for euer.

The sentence of the Court vpon these Pleadings pronounced by the first President, on Monday the 17. of Ianuary, was confirmable to the conclusion; taken by Monſieur L'Aduo-

A Aduocate for the Kings Attorney Generall.

The King and Duke tooke great pleasure to heare them. Both gaue their opinions on them that had best pleaded, but aboue all, they commended the equity of the Court, which dismissed the parties free fild further sute. The King at the Dukes request granted a pardon to a poore woman an Adulteresse that was condemned to die, whose Adulterer had bene executed for that he had abused her being a house-hold seruant, & so had the beene in like sort, but that she was found with Child. This Pardon was granted by the King vnto the Duke, notwithstanding any opposition made by the Court & the Kings Council, shewing the consequence thereof. His Maieſty would haue it passe of his absolute authority. Yet vpon condition that shee should liue in perpetuall prison B and norrishd at her Husband charge. All these good receptions; all these exercises; all these pastimes, did not make the Duke forget the care of his affaires, he had sayd vnto Monſieur de Villeroy. That he was not come to yeld up the Marquisate. The King on the other side being at Fontainebleau sayd vnto him, That he should be alwayes his friend, but he would haue his Marquisate. The Duke was aduertised that the King had sayd primarily in his Cabinet. That the Duke was a braue and gallant Prince, yet he kept his Marquisate: These words made him presume, that the report which the Cheualier Breton and Roncas had made vnto him (that the King was desirous to see him, and that they should agree) was not true, for whenſoeuer the Duke spake to the King in priuate touching that businesse, he desired him to referre it to their Councils.

C And although this was a very important businesse, yet the King had one which did presse him neerer, which was his Marriage. Being aduertised, as wee haue formerly shewed, by Sillery his Ambaſſador at Rome, that the Pope had granted his desire touching the nullity of his marriage, he sent Alincourt (Gouernor of Pontoise) to thanke him, and to aske his aduice vpon the alliance hee desired to contract with the house of Florence. He came to Lions, to passe to Auignon by the riuer of Rhone, and so to Anibo, whether the State of Genoa sent him a Galley well appointed to conduſt him to their City, where hee was receiued with all the honors, fit for the greatnesse of the Prince that sent him, and worthy of the credit & reputation which the name of Villeroy carries among the friends of this Crowne. They did cast lots there, where he should be D lodged, which fell to the Pallace of Grimaldy, where hee was defraied two daies, at the charges of the State. The Ambaſſador of Spaine went to visit him. He went to the Senate, was seated in the Dukes place, and saw the order they held in their Councils and Deliberations, where they granted him liberty for two Galley-staues Frenchmen, that were in the Gallies of the Seigneury, the one was a Parisian and the other a Lionois, which they esteemed a fit fauour to grateſie a Prince. He went in post to Rome: the Ambaſſador met him with a great number of French Gentlemen, hee lodged him in his house, and the second day of his arriual he had audience of the Pope. He continued in Rome vntill Easter, during his aboad, he did see the Vice-roy of Naples make his entry E into Rome, comming to do homage vnto the Pope for the Realme of Naples, presenting vnto him a white Steede, for an acknowledgement of the fee, for the inuestiture of Naples, for that it is one of the Realmes which holds in fee and doth homage vnto the Church of Rome and for that reason (besides the eight thousand Ounces of Gold which they owe yeerely,) they are bound to take armes for defence of the Church.

They had their part also of the fruites of the Holy yeare, during which time many Frenchmen and others of the Religion went to see for curiosities sake, without any feare of the Inquisition, whose iurisdiction doth cease in the yeare of Iubile: many great personages from diuers parts of Europe went to this Iubile, among the cheefe was the Duke of Bar, who went in a disguised habit, to get absolution, for that hee had beene married against the rules of the Church, and without dispensation of the decrees of consanguinity that were betwixt him and the Kings Sister, for which cause the Bishop of Lorraine refused him the holy Sacrament, and held him for excommunicate. The King assisted this Princes humility and submission with his letters of fauour to diuers Cardinals.

Monſieur d'Alincourt come to Genoa.

He came to Rome on Alhedvedes day the 6. of February.

8000 ounces of gold comes to fourescore thousand Crownes.

The Duke of Bar goes to Rome disguised, to the Cardinal Albrandin and Oſat and to Monſieur de Sillery.

Pro. 1. v. 11.

It is therefore no reason that the Complaynants should trouble the defendresse for the accusation which shee hath made, seeing it was not with any intent of slander: but they must take their trouble as an accident sent of God, as a mischance which the Grecians called a Divine Fortune. We must not vse the inhumanitie of Gneus Piso although he were an vpright man, and free from many vices, but hauing not the true rule of reason, hee tooke rigour for a resolution of seueritie, who being aduertised that two Souldiars going forth together, the one was returned without his companion, he condemned him as a murderer of him that was absent: and as the condemned man was in the hands of the Executioner at the place of Iustice, his companion (whome they held to be dead) returned: This rigorous Iudge hearing that the officer had pronounced the execution, he caused him to be apprehended, & to be brought vnto the scaffold, & with him the Companion, taking for a pretext that he was the cause of this mischance by his absence, and to him he added the officer, iudging him worthy of punishment, for that he had brought backe the first condemned, whome hee should haue presently executed according to the sentence. It is not fit in all causes, to stand so stilly vpon Iudgments: as Alexander the Great did, who had rather pay a fine for Athenodorus then remit it: for sometimes a temper of humanitie is commendable, as in this case: Imitating the example of Prince Titus, the Son of Vespasian, when he deliuered Iosephus out of prison, saying vnto the Emperour his Father, after that hee had commended the prisoner to be vnbond: It is reason O Father, that with his bonds the dishonor should be taken from Iosephus, for he shall bee as if in the beginning he had not bene bound. But if we vnbond him, we must cut the chaine, for so they vse them that are vniustly bound. A speech of a worthy Prince, witnessed by the History of Iosephus, worthy to be spoken before a great King, and well approved of by the Emperour: As true lippes please Kings, and they loue him that speaks iust things with a pure heart.

And therefore to make an end of the Plaintiffs miserie with that of Iosephus, the Court if it please, hauing in some sort regard vnto their request, shall set them at Liberty, declaring them innocents of the cryme of hospitalitie violated, and of the murder wherof they haue bene accused, without ad iudging vnto them (notwithstanding) any Reparation, Charges, Damages, and interests against the Accuser, seeing the hath not, nor cannot be iudged a Slanderer. So either partie obtayning what they may hope for by reason, things iudged shall remayne in their authoritie, and, God who holds the Kings heart in his hand as little brooks of running water, inclining to his will, shall make him raine happily, and his Posteritie after him, as all good Frenchmen and true Christians doe wish by a happy Marriage, so as our great Henry the fourth, sitting in the throne of Iustice, or represented by his Councillors, mayntaining his Countries shall disperse all danger by his looke: and euery one will say with Saloman, the wel beloued of God. That the seat of the King which iudgeth the poore iustly, shall bee firme for ever.

The sentence of the Court vpon these Pleadings pronounced by the first President, on Monday the 17. of January, was confirmable to the conclusion; taken by Monsieur L'Aduo-

A Aduocate for the Kings Attorney Generall.

The King and Duke tooke great pleasure to heare them. Both gaue their opinions on them that had best pleaded, but about all, they commended the equity of the Court, which dismissed the parties free f^ro further sute. The King at the Dukes request graunted a pardon to a poore woman an Adulteresse that was condemned to die, whose Adulterer had bene executed for that he had abused her being a house-hold seruant, & to had the beene in like sort, but that she was found with Child. This Pardon was granted by the King vnto the Duke, notwithstanding any opposition made by the Court & the Kings Councel, shewing the consequence thereof. His Maiesty would haue it passe of his absolute authority. Yet vpon condition that shee should liue in perpetuall prison and norrishd at her Husbands charge. All these good receptions; all these exercites; all these pastimes, did not make the Duke forget the care of his affaires, he had sayd vnto Monsieur de Villeroi. That he was not come to yeeld up the Marquisate. The King on the other side being at Fontainebleau sayd vnto him, That he should be alwaies his friend, but he would haue his Marquisate. The Duke was aduertised that the King had sayd priuately in his Cabinet. That the Duke was a braue and a gallant Prince, yet he kept his Marquisate: These words made him presume, that the report which the Cheualier Breton and Rencas had made vnto him (that the King was desirous to see him, and that they should agree) was not true, for whensoever the Duke spake to the King in priuate touching that businesse, he desired him to referre it to their Councillors.

C And although this was a very important businesse, yet the King had one which did presse him neerer, which was his Marriage. Being aduertised, as wee haue formerly shewed) by Sillery his Ambassador at Rome, that the Pope had granted his desire touching the nullity of his marriage, he sent Aincourt (Governor of Pontoise) to thanke him, and to aske his aduice vpon the alliance hee desired to contract with the house of Florence. He came to Lions, to passe to Auignon by the riuer of Rhone, and so to Antibo, whether the State of Genoa sent him a Galley well appointed to conduct him to their City, where hee was receiued with all the honors, fit for the greatnesse of the Prince that sent him, and worthy of the credit & reputation which the name of Villeroi carries among the friends of this Crowne. They did cast lots there, where he should be lodged, which fell to the Pallace of Grimaldy, where hee was defraied two daies, at the charges of the State. The Ambassador of Spainne went to visit him. He went to the Senate, was seated in the Dukes place, and saw the order they held in their Councillors and Deliberations, where they granted him liberty for two Galley-staues Frenchmen, that were in the Gallies of the Seigneury, the one was a Parisian and the other a Lionois, which they esteemed a fit fauour to gratifie a Prince. He went in post to Rome: the Ambassador met him with a great number of French Gentlemen, hee lodged him in his house, and the second day of his arriual he had audience of the Pope. He continued in Rome vntill Easter, during his aboad, he did see the Vice-roy of Naples make his entry into Rome, comming to do homage vnto the Pope for the Realme of Naples, presenting vnto him a white Steede, for an acknowledgem^t of the fee, for the inuestiture of Naples, for that it is one of the Realmes which holds in fee and doth homage vnto the Church of Rome and for that reason (besides the eight thousand Ounces of Gold which they owe yeerely,) they are bound to take armes for defence of the Church.

They had their part also of the frutes of the Holy yeare, during which time many Frenchmen and others of the Religion went to see for curiosities sake, without any feare of the Inquisition, whose iurisdiction doth cease in the yeare of Iubile: many great personages from diuers parts of Europe went to this Iubile, among the cheefe was the Duke of Bar, who went in a disguised habit, to get absolution, for that hee had bene married against the rules of the Church, and without dispensation of the degrees of consanguinity that were betwixt him and the Kings Sister, for which cause the Bishop of Lorraine refused him the holy Sacrament, and held him for excommunicate. The King assisted this Princes humililty and submission with his letters of fauour to diuers Cardinals.

Deputies for the King and Duke.The Popes Nuntio in-treats the King to leave the protection of Geneva.

The Duke of Sauoy was not pleased with the long delays of the Court, he complained that he was intreated with to great rigour. The Duke thought to finde a King of Complements: And the King a Duke more easie to restore that which he held. The Duke couered his discontent with silence and discretion. In the end they agree to treat of their affaires and differences by Deputies: For the King, were named the Constable, the Chancellor, the Marshall Biron, the Marquis Rhosny, and Villeroy. For the Duke, Bely his Chancellor, the Marquis of Lullins, Jacob, the Earle of Moret, and Almes. The Kings Deputies demand restitution of the Marquifate of Saluces, in the same Estate it was in when the Duke surprized it. The Dukes first proposition was to haue the King renounce the protection of Geneua, the which was not (sayd they) comprehended in the Treaty of Peace, in speciall words, as other Townes. This did much offend the King and his Councell. The Duke intreated the Popes Nuntio to make this proposition, who (hauing his soule as free from craft and dissimulation as it was full of zeale and integrity) found meanes to speake vnto the King without trouble or alteration. He sayd that there was a meanes to vnite the extremities of their wills: for the same reason which required the Duke to restore the Marquifate, did not hinder his Maiesty from the enioying of that which did belong vnto him. It is true (sayd the King). There the Nuntio replied: The Towne of Geneua belongs vnto the Duke, and nothing hinders him from settling the authority which his Predecessors had there, but the power of your protection.

Is it not then reason that as you will haue him restore the Marquifate which is yours, you should suffer him to enioye the Towne of Geneua which is his? The King to be speedily freed of this argument, answered, that things were different, that hee had not made the protection of Geneua: It was a Treaty wherunto he was bound by faith, for the reuerence he did beare vnto his Predecessors, who had made them selues Protectors of that Common-weale, from whom they had receiued seruice in their necessities: And he would neuer oppose himselfe against the firmnes of their promises. The Nuntio sayes presently vnto the King. As you will not leaue the protection of Geneua for that it was made with your Predecessors, in like sort the Duke is not bound to yeelde you the Marquifate of Saluces, for that he tooke it not from you, but from the deceased King. Our difference replied the King, although (for my part) it consists of many points, is reduced onely to that which concernes the Marquifate of Saluces. The vlturper must restore the Duke of Sauoy hath vsurped my Marquifate, there is nothing that doth free him from restitution. I hold nothing of his, and therefore must not restore him any thing. I will neuer hinder him from hauing reason of Geneua, so as hee get it without armes: for when hee shall come thether with force, I will alwaies resolute of that which I ought. He thinks that if I should abandon that Towne, he might force them to acknowledge him: but I should purchase in abandoning them much blame, it being against the honor of this Crowne and the firmnesse of a Kings word.

The Duke had reason to affect this place: he might make a great Bulwarkethereof against the Swisses, to recover that which they did hold from the ancient house of Sauoy, and to make all things difficult for the French, among the Cantons: This proposition of Geneua was razed out of the Duke articles, & no more spoken of in the Assembly of the Deputies. They did presse the restitution of the Marquifate, or the exchange of the Countries of Bresse, Pigneroll and Saualan, with some valleys for the passage of Piedmont. The Deputies assembled but once. The Duke foreseeing what the issue would be, and hauing vnderstood that the Chancellor speaking of the Restitution or Exchange, had sayd that they must passe that way or by the sword: he let the King vnderstand that to many delt in the busines, and that it should be sooner ended, if but one did faithfully report the intentions of either part. The Patriarke of Constantinople was employed therein, but the Duke disliked thereof.

Hee refused to free himselfe of these difficulties, and to runne the hazard and shame of the refusal. Then hee presented his first proposition of the Empire and Duchie of Milan: giuing him very plausible meanes, if they had bene

As easie in the execution as in the discourse: shewing that for all the fruite of the conquest, he desired nothing but to hold the Marquifate of Saluces. Wherunto the King answered; That he was neither of that age, nor his affaires in that estate, that King Francis his were, when he aspired to the Empire. That there was not a Duke of Saxony nor a Langraue prisoner, to giue him the Title of Protector of Germany: and other Princes prisoners, as vnto King Henry the second. If a King of France should bee ambitious of any thing greater then his Crowne, it might bee an Empire, but not in the estate that it is now: the title of an Emperour beeing little more then that of a Duke of Venice, but as it was vnder Augustus, when as Rome which commands but 7. hills had reduced all the world vnder one Empire or at the least, as it was vnder Charlemagne. As for the Duchie of Milan, the King said that the enterprise was tedious, and the issue vncertaine, as of all other desseins, and for the meanes which the Duke discovered vnto him, there was nothing so easie which the King of Spain might not make difficult, hauing both Land and Sea at his commandement to hinder him. Besides it was the Nature of actions of War, still to produce v unexpected difficulties. You alone (added the King) can not succour me, I know not how my men will agree with yours. And if things should succeed according to your desire, I know not what shold become of the fruit of the Conquest. I haue enough to do in my Realme without thinking of others. The Peace is but in the flower, the vent of such a designe would wither it. I will haue no War with the King of Spain, while he be weary of Peace. Brother you haue no need of my Councell, but affection commands vs sometimes to giue it to him that doth not aske it. I would countell you to lue in good terms with him. If there were any troubles betwixt you, I would not meddle but to reconcile you. I haue too much care of the honour of my word, to breake a Peace so iust and so necessary without a precedent injury. If I did it, I should make my selfe the Argument of all the complaints of Christendome, the discourse of other Princes, the cause of a foraine War, and the renewing of infinite calamities. It were an indiscretion for me, vpon a vaine and imaginary hope, to loose the assurance to recouer mine own, wherewith I content my selfe without seeking an others. The desires which are infinit, are vnworthy of a iust Prince, they are proper to Tyrants, who raigne without Lawe, and lue without Feare: if I had any will to that which you propound, there should not need so many words: but hauing no will to it, it is in vaine for me to speake of it.

None of these words could content the Duke, but dissembling his discontent, he answered. If I should reape no other good by my voyage but to haue scene so great a Prince, whose valour and greatnesse is greater then the report, I should not be grieved. True it is, that the estate of my affaires should haue perswaded me to haue come without the assurance of my Ambassadors, that I should receiue more of your Maiesties free will, then I could expect of the Popes sentence, and that you would not so much presse the Restitution, but would be satisfied with a gentler Composition. I haue offered you the meanes, which lead to so great and so worthy effects, as the Marquifate of Saluces is nothing in comparison of them. You find difficulties therein. There is no great enterprise, can be without them, but being wel resolute, it is halfe executed. A courage like vnto yours finds nothing difficult, and all Europe admires your actions, hauing made that which was impossible possible. And seeing that I must attribute it, not vnto the violence of reason, but to my unhappines, that I cannot perswade a thing, which in his Glory and Profit carries his own Perswasion. I beseech your Maiesty to intreat me, as your most humble seruant & kinsman, who desires no greater happines for his the to be yours. They are already by the Laws of Nature, they are by my wil: & shall be more by the fauours of your bounty. For one Marquifate, you bind many Princes, and by the inuesting of one of my children, all the house of Sauoy shall be bound vnto you: your Maiesty will say, that you make not such large gifts: but you must consider if you please, that many vertues are common to men, but this belongs onely to Kings. As it is more royall to giue then to take. And they wrong the greatnesse of their courage, if they should not giue great things: And to giue a thing that is li-

Hee added many reasons for the execution of the enterprize, and with such vehemence, as he seemed to haue some secret, to make Mountaines remoue and drie vp Rivers. The King considered that there was no profit but for the Duke, and that the fruite which (at the least) he promised himself in keeping the Marquisate of Saluzzes, would be more certaineto him, then the Conquest of Milan vnto the King. If the Duke of Sauoy could haue ingaged the King, he knew well how to crosse him in the execution. All the danger he could apprehend, was the King of Spaines indignation: but hee might as easily returne into fauour without speaking a word, as he came away without bidding him farewell, For what should haue hindered him, when as the French had bin far ingaged in Italy, to haue ioyned with the Spaniards to expell them, and to breake the B

Bridge of his assistance, whereby he had made them to passe. The Duke seeing that he could not obaine any thing of the King, but that he must make a double recompence for the Marquisate, he continued a while in doubt of his returne, as he alwayes repented him of his coming. The King desirous to free him of all cause of distrust and apprehension, that should force his will, to promise that which hee would neuer hold, sent him word, that he should not trouble himselfe with the Resolution of his Councell: for he should neuer be forced but by the right of Armes, and that he should alwayes haue time to thinke of it, and to returne to Paris with his will as free, as when he came to Paris.

Passionate Councells.

The Duke would depart without taking his leave.

The Duke not able to see clearly with his owne eyes, nor to distinguish of these difficulties, aduised thereof in his Councell. But as the eyes troubled with those diseases which the Physicians terme Hypostragma and Ictere, haue the operation of the sight so troubled, as they cannot well iudge of colours, all objects seeming vnto the Yellow or Red. Euen so when Princes Councells are subiect to any passion, they giue counsell accordingly, nothing presenting it selfe vnto them, but through the false sight of Opinion and Choller, which doth alwayes make the bodies seeme bigger then they are. So in the Councell of this Prince, those which desired War, said That neither the Restitution of the Marquisate, nor the Exchange of Bresse, might be accepted, and that a good Varre should be more honourable, then a shamefull Composition: Others hauing no other passion then Peace, aduised him vnto it at what price soeuer, fearing, that if the King should not receiue that satisfaction from them which he expected, hee would stay them. The Duke grew into choller, and would haue departed without taking his leave. The most aduised of his Councell told him, that his departure in that sort, would make him a by-word to all the Princes of Italy; Spaine would laugh at him; France would be scandalized; that all Europe would hold him the cause of this War, and in this War of a world of miseries. That there needed no other Herald to proclaime War against him; which would be in the midst & in the foure corners of his Estate, before that he had passed the River of Rhone. That he shewed the greatnes of his courage to vanquish all these difficulties, and wisdom to dissemble his discontents. That wisdom should make the entry to a busines, seeing that repentance is fruitlesse in the ende. That if he had not foreseene the end of his voyage, hee should by his constancy mitigate the feeling, and represent vnto himselfe that to come into a goodly Paine all couered with flowers, he was forced to passe ouer a narrow and vneuen Plank. The Duke answered, I will neuer passe it. Leauing his Councell in suspence, that he would make as dishonorable a departure, as his arriuall had bin honorable: yet through the Prayers and perswasions of some of the Kings good seruants, the Duke resolved to depart as he came. But it was not without complaining that they intreated him with too much rigour. That there was no curtesie in France for him: That friendships were rare, finding least in them where he thought it did most abound: That they did force him to formes that were too preiudiciall, and that they had made him to hope for things which they now refused him, and that his Ambassador had deceiued him. The King knowing that Chevalier Breton had let the Duke of Sauoy his Master vnderstand, that his Maiesty desired he should come vnto him. He said vnto him that he was mistaken, & that he did neuer speake it.

True

A True it is, that he had sayd, that he hoped the Duke should not returne, but they should be agreed. The Duke seeing that Witdom must moderate the rigour of Necessity, he took another course, and resolues, (seeing he could get nothing else) to make his profit of the time, and of his abode: that he might haue meanes to vnitte that which hee had disioyned with Spaine. Foreseeing they would soone giue him leaue to be gone, for already they sayd in iest, in the Antichamber, That they must send him away by an Edict. He had therfore found a fauourable pretext for his stay. He was (or made thewe to be) in loue with one of the rarest beauties in the Court, and seemed not to care for all other affayres in respect of her. There were two solemne Feasts at Paris, which followed one another, S. Germans Fayre and Shrouetide. It was giuen out, that hee would see them before his departure. In the meane time he makes no haste, although he did not much aduance in his affayres. There were dayly new propositions, and the Last were more vnpleasing vnto him then the first.

A pretext of
stay.

The Kings Seruants were of opinion, that they should giue this Prince as little cause as might be to distrust him of his voyage, and to giue him time to consider whether he should consent to the Exchange or the Restitution: for that it was a thing (as he sayd) which hee could not doe without conference with his Councell, and the aduice of his Vassalls. The King hauing had the opinion of the Princes of his blood and others, & of the cheefe Officers of the Crowne, would no longer forbear to acquaint him with his resolution, commanding Sebastian Zamet (one of his Maiesties confident seruants) to tell it him, the which he did so artificially, as before he left the Duke, he drew from him a writing of the principall conditions of the Treaty, by the which were drawne the Articles of the Restitution of the Marquisate or of the Exchange. But to the ende the Duke should not thinke that the King would precipitate his Councells, hee gaue him three months time to choose eyther of the two conditions of the Treaty, either by Restitution or the Exchange. Whereupon the Duke signed the Articles following.

Articles of the Treaty of Paris.

1. That the Duke of Sauoy should restore the Marquisate of Saluzzes vnto his Maiesty, by the first day of the moneth of Iune next following, to vse & inioy as the Kings Predecessors had done, when it was in their hands, without any delay or difficulty, grounded vpon any colour or pretext whatsoeuer. 2. And his sayd Maiesty doth promise and grant vnto the sayd Duke, not to giue the Charge and Government of that Country, to any one that hee shall haue occasion to hold for enemy. 3. In like sort, to imploy Suisses in the Garde of the Townies & Places thereof, except in the Castles, where his Maiesty will place French Captaines and Souldiars, or such as he shall thinke good. 4. Notwithstanding, his Maiesty doth not meane to be bound to continue the Suisses in the sayd Townes, but for the time that the Compromise shal continue, made in the Person of his Holines, hereafter declared, & specified. 5. Or else the said Duke shall yeeld and deliuer to his Maiesty, for a recompence of the Marquisate of Saluzzes, by the first day of Iune next ensuing, all the Country of Erse, lying from the River of Saone vnto that of Dain, which River of Dain shall remaine in common betwixt his Maiesty and the sayd Duke, eyther of them to inioy it of his side, comprehending in the sayd Country the Towne and Cittadell of Bourg, and other places that depend thereon, Barcellona with his Vicariate, or Deputishipp, vnto Argentiere, the vale of Stures, that of Perouse, with all that depends thereon; with the Towne and Castle of Pignoral with his territory, vpon condition that his Maiesty shall transport vnto him all his right and interest to the sayd Marquisate, poulded notwithstanding that he suffer the Inhabitants of the sayd Marquisate, which haue serued his Maiesty, or shall serue him hereafter, to inioy their goods freely and safely. And in like sort, those which haue serued or shall serue the sayd Duke, shall in like manner enioy their goods, as well in the sayd Marquisate, as any other places that shall be deliuered to his Maiesty by the said Duke, without any alteration before the said delay nor after, to the preiudice of the one or the other, according to the rule which shal be set downe by his Maiesty and the Duke. 6. Moreover the Towns of Cental, Emont

A ſayd Duke makes choiſe thereof, that our Holy Father Pope Clement the 8. ſhal iudge of all Controuerſies that are betwixt his Maieſty and the ſayd Duke, according to that which hath bin agreed vpon by the treaty of Vernins, and that within three yeares.

17. Promiſing to accompliſh & performe, faithfully on either part, whatſoeuer ſhal be decreed by his Holineſſe with in the time prefixed, without any delay or difficulty, for what cauſe or pretext ſoeuer, as it is concluded by the treaty of Vernins. 18. And for the greater aſſurance of the execution of the Treaty, and euery point and Article therein conteyned, the ſayd King and Duke of Sauoy, humbly beſeech his Holineſſe, that as by his good and fatherly exhortations they are entred into this way of Accord, that it would pleaſe him as a common Father, to continue the care which he hath formerly ſhewed to norriſh Peace, and to aſſure a firme friendſhip betwixt them, and in all occaſions that ſhould be offered to interpoſe his Authority for the full and reall execution of things promiſed of either part, as it is conteyned in this preſent Treaty. Made at Paris, the 27. day of February. 1600. Signed, Henry and Emanuel, and ſealed with his Maieſties ſeale and the Duke of Sauoyes.

Three or foure daies after this Treaty, the Duke tooke his leaue of the King, who being followed by all the Court conducted him to Pont Charenton, and gaue him the Baron of Lux to attend on him out of the Realme, with commandement to the Gouernors of Champagne & Bourgondy, where he ſhould paſſe to receiue him, as his Maieſty they would. Whileſt he was neere the King he ſhewed ſuch outward content, & concealed his greefe ſo cunningly, as his owne people did iudge that nothing could better content him. But being a little retired, his countenance bewraied his diſcontent and the repentance of his voiage. He farther hee went from the King, the neerer he approached to Spaine: being reſolute to reconcile himſelfe, and to that end he preſently diſpatched Bely his Chancellor. Being in Caroffe, he ſayd ſometimes, that he had bene deceived, that the words which they had giuen to perſwade him to come into France, were ill interpreted: and that as ſoone as hee ſhould come to Chambery, hee would ſend to beſeech the King to prolonge the time, in the which hee would make choiſe of the Reſtitution or the Exchange.

The Baron of Lux obſerued his diſcourſes, and aduerted the King of the Dukes intention, wholly inclyned to Warre, rather then to performe any part of the Treaty. Being vpon Saint Inhans bridge, the Baron of Lux, hauing commandement from the King not to go any farther, tooke his leaue of the Duke, and aſſuring himſelfe that his words ſhould be as pleaſing vnto him, as he ſeemed to haue bene content with his conduct, hee beſeeched him not to transport his Heart out of France as he did his Bodie, but to cheriſh the friendſhip of ſo great a King derely; who loued him as his Brother. That he feared, that ſuch as had ſhewed ſo great diſcontent, for the voiage, which his Heighneſſe had made into France, would reape the profit which hee himſelfe might enioye. That he ſhould hold their Councells not only ſuſpect, but dangerous: as paſſionate men, whoſe perſwaſions were ſugred poiſons. Who being more iealous of his Greatneſſe, then deſirous of his Quiet, would not ceaſe vntill they had diuerted him from the execution of his promiſes. That if it pleaſed him to thinke of what was paſt, and compare it with the preſent, he ſhould ſinde that Peace was the inexpugnable rampar of his Eſtates: and that it was a great miſery for a Prince, to ſubmit himſelfe to an others diſcretion, beſeeching him to belecue that the Councell which hee gaue him, was the ſame which he would giue him, if it had pleaſed God that hee had bene borne his Vaſſal or one of his Councell.

I take (answered the Duke) that which you ſay vnto mee as of a Nobleman of Iudgement, and thanke you: I acknowledg my ſelfe ſo much bound vnto the King, as I would ſacrifice my life in exchange of the dutie which I owe him: and doe promiſe neuer to giue him any occaſion, to eſteeme mee other then his moſt humble ſeruant and louing Kinsman. 1600. but to disguise their inward conceptions, houlding dissimulation for a great vertue. Such was the issue of the Duke of Sauoyes voyage. The yeare shall not passe before he tast the fruit. His presence did procure him the condition of exchange, the which the King would not haue granted to his Ambassadors. But hee continued not long in this opinion, to performe the one or the other. Going out of my Cittadell at Bourg, they found that sorrow troubled his soule, to leaue a place, esteemed one of the strongest in Europe. Being arrived at Bourg, hee sent one post vnto the King, to thanke him for the honor he had receiued in his voyage, and for the good entertainment which Pradin had giuen him in Champaigne, and the Baron of Lux in Bourgundy. Hee writ by the same post to the Gouverneur of Lions, imparting vnto him the contentment which he receiued by the treatie of Paris, and that hee went to Chambery, and soone after the Feast into Piedmont, there to resolve what the King should expect of him.

The Duke going forth of Bourg had teares in his eyes.

But hee stayed not long before he gaue eare to their perswasions, who sought to deprive him of all happinesse, which hee might promise vnto himselfe by his voyage: assuring him that the coming of the Count de Fuentes would giue him meanes to free himselfe from the necessitie of the Exchange and Restitution. Hee dissimbled the discontent of his voyage with great arte, yet still hee did vent out some vapour which made the most iudicious to beleue, that he would be glad to preiudice the King in any thing with the hazard of his owne. We haue sayd before, that in the ende of the yeare the Arch-duke Albert, had retired his army out of the Ile of Rommel, where he had left a good garrison in the new fort of Saint Andrews, and in the fort of Creue-cœur which the Admirall had taken. This winter was sharpe and long, during the which the garrisons of the sayd forts of Creue-cœur, and Saint Andrews suffered much, having receiued no pay for many months that were due vnto them from the Arch-duke. This was the pretext of their mutiny, expelling all their Captaines and Officers, and committing all acts of hostility, as well vpon the Arch-dukes subjects as vpon the enemies Country, protesting notwithstanding to continue in the seruice & obedience of the King of Spaine, & of Albert Arch-duke of Austria his Brother in Law: demanding nothing but their pay, whereof the Arch-duke and the Infants shewed themselves some-what excheffe. Count Maurice (who was also retired) being loth to loose the opportunity of this mutiny, ment to make his profit of it: Winter being spent he appointed the Rendez-vous for his army about Roterdsme and Willemstad the 18. of March 1600. hee parted from Hage and came to Dort, where imbarcking two daies after with his army, hee mounted vp the riuer of Meuse, with 200. sayle vnto the fort of Creue-cœur. The 21. having landed his army and begun to plant his Cannon, hee summoned the place to yeeld. There were foure companies of Wallons in it, who remembering their mutiny (although all were pardoned, or at the least so promised them) and the small like-hood they had of any timely succors, and the great diligence the Prince vsed to force them, they yeelded to the Composition that was offered them, and the 24. day they yeelded the Fort: whereof two Companies (not trusting to the Arch-duke) did offer willingly to serue the States, and the other two retired to Saint Andrews Fort.

The fort of Creue-cœur beleagued and yeelded to Count Maurice.

S. Andrews fort beleagued.

Count Maurice seeing this happy beginning, entred with his army into the Ile of Rommel, to beleage S. Andrews fort, the which he did the 29. of the sayd moneth, notwithstanding the continuall raine and cold, his men beeing forced to lie disperfed in their ships vpon the riuer of Meuse and Wahal. Being before the Fort, he presently caused many Forts to be built to assure his Campe, and to keepe the Spaniards from succoring of the place, or so annoyning him by his courtes. The Prince being thus fortified within his Campe, the Arch-duke was out of all hope to succor it, all things falling out crossely, for the waters were so great, as the trenches of the Princes Campe were filled, and they Beseeged were forced to lodge like Conies in the Rampars, suffering much vpon hope to be Succored. Reconciled and Paied, and doing their endeuors to hinder the Princes approaches. The first of May the waters beeing shronke a little, the Prince commanded approaches to bee made in a darke night with good trenches, sent

A ding a trumpet to summon the Beseeged: who (although they were well resolved to hold the place for the Arch-duke) gaue eare and were willing to enter into parley with him.

The 4. and 5. of the sayd moneth Wirtembrou and Vander Aa, were sent vnto some that met the without the trenches of the halfe Moone, which they of S. Andrews Fort had built without their Counterscarpe. They giue the to vnderstand in this conference, what small means there was to succor them, the doubtfulness of their reconciliation, & the small likehood to be payd by the Arch-duke for their seruices, the which mounted to great summes of money, considering the great necessity of their affaires: wherevnto the Deputies answered: that there was due vnto them five hundred thousand Florins, that hetherto they had defended themselves, and endured almost impossible things, that they would neuer yeeld vp the place vntil they were payd their due, by whome soeuer. The Prince offered them a hundred thousand Florins, but vpon the refusall thereof, the parley brake off: The beseeged hauing discovered a signe made with Torch from Bosledue, which was but two Leagues off, aduertising them that they should be succored within foure daies.

The Beseeged being to much vnaccommodated, seeing the Princes soldiars aduance euen vnto the foot of their Counterscarpe, and that they appointed to make two Bridges to go vnto the assault, after a breach were made: the said foure daies of their hope being expired, & seeing no shew of succors about two of the clocke in the afternoone the same day, they demanded againe, if the Prince would harken to a composition. The Prince fearing (as it soone after fell out) an other overflowing of the Riuers, which would force him to abandon his Approches and Trenches, and to retire his Cannon with some difficultie: The Beseeged hauing sent eight Deputies vnto him, a composition was made, and a hundred and five and twentie thousand Florins promised them, with condition that they should continue still in the Fort vntill the money were payd. Promising and swearing vnto the Prince: that so long as they continued in the Fort, attending the money, they should keepe it faithfully for the States and Prince, and withall should obey such Captaines and Officers as should bee sent vnto them by him, renouncing and reuoking the oath which they had formerly made vnto the King of Spaine, or to Albert the Archduke of Austria. Whereupon Articles were drawne on both parts, which I omit for breuities sake, referring the Reader to the Originall. The eleuenth of the sayd Moneth they went out of the Fort, and were payed by the Commissaries of the States, by the Powle, being a thousand one hundred twenty and foure men by muster, the least of them receiuing a hundred and fixe Florins. They being gone forth, the Prince sent in foure of his companies, and then he entred with all the Noblemen of his army. After they had receiued their money, they were presently shipt, and sent away into Garrison into diuers Townes of those Prouinces.

S. Andrews Fort taken.

Behold the Fort which was held Impregnable, easily wonne by the States, and not onely the Place, Artillery, Munition, and prouisions of Warre and Victuals (which were more worth then 125000. Florins) but a troupe of as braue men as the Archduke had of long time in his army, choyle and old trayned souldiars. The Prince found in this Fort ninetie and fixe barrels of Poulder, eighteene peeces of Ordinance, with a great quantitie of Wheate, Rye, Malt, and other Graine, and Victuals. About this time Monsieur d' Briauté a yong French Gentleman, Capitaine of a companie of horse in the States pay, and exceeding valiant, beeing in garrison in the Towne of Saint Gheertruidenbergh, receiued some wordes of reproch, as well to his owne person, as to the French nation, ill reported, and lightly deliuered, by a souldiar which had runne away from the States seruice, his name was Lekerbitken (that is to say a daintie morcell,) for his courage, Lieutenant to Grobendoncs companie of Horse, who was Gouverneur of Bosledue in Brabant. Briauté wronging his degree and reputation to meddle with one which was not of his quality, for such light words which are ordinary among souldiars, sent him a challenge, desying him, bodie to bodie, sue to sue 1600. five, tenne to tenne, or twentie to twentie. This challenge was accepted by Lekerbitken. A ken, of twentie against twentie, on horsebacke, with such armes as they did usually carrie at the Warre. The day and place was appointed, although Prince Maurice did dissuade and forbid him, alleading the frivolous occasion of the quarrell, and the inequality of his person to that of a Traitor and Renigadoe: But Briante hauing made choise of nineteene horsemen of his companie, (almost all French), in whom he trusted most, himselfe making the twentieth, hee went out of Gheertruisdenberghe, telling Win- garde Gouernour of the place, that it was with the Princes consent, and hauing giuen him, (if he died in the Combate) his best armes (the which were as faire, as rich, and as curiously wrought, as any Prince could weare) hee went to the place appointed for the Combat, midway betwixt Bosledue and Gheertruisdenberghe.

Briante finding not his enemye advanced further then hee ought, meeting halfe a League from Bosledue, vpon their approach they charged equally: Briante and his com-panie with long Pistolls onely, and Lekerbitken with Carabin and Petronell.
 The two Commanders had before giuen a signe to know one another: Briante who had a great white feather, made choise of Lekerbitken who had a red, and charged him with such great furie, as hee slue him, shooting him in at the sight of his caske; at this charge there were five of them of Bosledue slaine, whereof the Brother of Le- kerbitken was one: It seemed Briante should vanquish, but they of Bosledue reluming courage to renenge the death of their leader, returned more furiously then before to the charge, the which stocke a terror into Briantes companie, who flying away, left their Captaine in danger, who was taken Prisoner with a Cosin of his, and was carried with three of the companie to Bosledue, Grobendonc being before the port, expecting the returne of Lekerbitken, and to learne with the first how the combat succeeded, seeing not his Lieutenant, he demanded where he was: they answered that he was slaine, and his Brother with him, hee replied, and why haue ye not then slaine these? at which wordes his men fell vpon Briante and his Cosine, & murdered them in cold blood.

This yeare the Emperour made the Duke of Mercurie Lieutenant General of his army in Hungarie, sending him his Commission, the which he would not accept without the Kings commandement, esteeming no honor nor greatnes in the world, to bee desired or accepted of a Subject, without the permission of his Prince. The King liked well of it. This was his second voyage into Hungarie: who after that hee had received the Emperours commandement at Vienna, he went directly to Luarin, where hee was acknowledged Lieutenant General to the Emperour in his army: the which was very small in number, but very great in courage and resolution to doe well. Wee haue shewed before how that Michael Palatin of Valachia, vanquished Cardinall Batory, and the Transiluanians, and how hee became Master of Clausembourg, in the Emperours name. Let vs now see how ambition blinded him, and how hee lost Valachia, and was forced to liue at Vienna, a pensioner to the Emperour.

In the beginning of this yeare, a second Ambassador came from the Turke, vnto the Palatin of Valachia, to draw him from the Emperours alliance, & to inuite him to haue intelligence with the Turke. The Palatin went to meet this Ambassador with a great traine and wel appointed. His name was Haraiam, an old Captaine, and of a reuer-ent aspect. Coming neere together, both of them lighted, and hauing embraced one another, the Aga took off the Palatins sword, and girt him after the manner of great men in Turky, with a Perisun Cimeter, all glistering with gold and precious stones, with many other presents, among the which were fethers of Heames, and Cranes all black, the which are excellent among them: there were also two red Enseigns, 7 Horses, & a braue Falcon exquisitely fet out: which presents were after their manner carried aloft before the sayd Palatin: Hee holding the right hand as Lord, and the Ambassador the left, they entred into Cronstat, the souldiars standing of either side, whilst the Cannon shot off, in signe of ioy. The Emperours Agents were there, and beheld all this:
 the Palatin doubing they would enter into some icalousie, called them, & wished them not to bee moued for all this, nor to thinke that hee would incline to the Turkes friendship

A ship, and that he would alwayes doe what should be reason: but that hee could doe no lesse then intreat this Ambassador ciuilly and honorably, if hee would not be reputed discourteous: Notwithstanding he intreated them to cause George Basta to retyre, for some priuat respects that were betwixt them, and that they should cause some other to come. The Emperours Agents made shewe to beleene him, and presented him with thirtie thousand Crownes in the Emperours name, wherwith he was not very well pleased. This George Basta had bene Lieutenant of the Emperours army in Transilvania, since that Sigismond Batorie would haue yielded it to the Emperour, and afterwards repented him, giuing it to Cardinall Andrew his Kinsman. The Palatins harred against Basta was, for that he had discouraged the Intelligences that he had with the Turke, and aduertised the Emperour thereof. In the meane time the Valachian blinded with this great victorie against Batorie, treated with the Emperours Agents by Articles.

First he would that Transilvania (the which he sayd belonged to him, and to his Son, by hereditarie right) should remaine vnto him, demanding moreouer Varadin, Hust, Nagban, and the confines of Hungary. Secondly hee would haue the same pensions that Sigismond Batory had, & where-withall to maintaine an army continually on foot, Thirdly that the Emperour, and other Christian Princes should promise to reduce him, in case he were taken prisoner by the Turke: And moreouer if he should be expelled Vala- chia, and Transilvania, that they should giue him a hundred thousand Crownes yearely, to maintaine him like a Prince: and vpon these conditions he would stand firme to the Christian party, and would undertake to bring in subiection vnto the Emperour, all the Country lying from the Ponticke Sea, vnto Buda, Alba regalis and Solnoc: so as he might be Lord of the Riuier of Tibische. These insolent demands did offend the Emperours Agents, and were the cause of the Valachians ruine. In the meane time Si- gismond Batory hauing taken armes againe, and ioyned with Jerome Vauoide of Molda- uia, made a Campe volant, of meane forces, consisting of Moldauians, Polonians, Turks and Tartarians.

The Valachian, goes to encounter Batorie with fiftie thousand men, the which hee ledde through the Mountaines, where for want of victualls they were forced to eate leaues of trees. Notwithstanding Batory and Jerome beeing terrified, fled into D Poland. The Palatin seizeth vpon Moldauia, where Jerome was much hated for his ex-actions: He made them to take an oath as well to the Emperour, as to himselfe and his Sonne. Then hee seekes for his enemy, who was towards the Riuier of Danuby, with thirty thousand men, at a strong Castle called Ortan: He gaue him battell and wonne it with the losse of twoe thousand men, but the Moldauian lost eight thousand men. The Valachian after he had settled his Sonne in Moldauia, retired himselfe into Transilvania.

At that time Zamoscki the great Chancellor of Poland, leured a newe army, to reduce Moldauia to the ancient Gouernment of the Polonians: This Army recovered Moldauia and conquered almost all Valachia. The Valachian aduertised the Lieutenant of the Emperours Armye in high Hungary, to be ready in case of necessity, and the Emperour himselfe, whom he promised by his letters to serue very faithfully, so as he would call Basta out of Transilvania: but it fell out contrary, for Doctor Petzen the Emperours Ambassador commanded him to obey Basta: the which did so transport him with rage, as he vsed all cruelty against the Noblest Houses of Transilvania, tormenting some, and putting others to death, the which purchased him the hatred of all men, and his friends forooke him, euen Moyes Secala, who had before assisted him more then any other, abandoned him: so as he lyued in feare on all sides, of the Turkes, the Tartars, the Polonians, Moldauians and Transiluanians. Basta vpon this occasion of hatred, drew the Transiluanians vnto him by loue, and taking Clausembourg, the chiefe towne, all the Estates of Transilvania came vnto him, & receiued him for their Vauoide, in the Emperours name.

The Valachi retired himself into the Mountaines, which deuides Valachia from Trans- extremity, as he was forced to submit himselfe with all humilitie to the Emperour, deliuering into his hands his Treasor, Wife and Children for Hostages: And to the Valachi came to Vienna, where hee was honorably receiued by the Archduke Matthias, and stayed there by commandement, vntill that that the Emperour came to Bo- gue. In the meane time the Transiluanians mutyned, and threatened to yeeld themselues vnto the Turke, if they would not grant them certaine conditions: so as the Em-perour would haue sent his Brother Maximilian, the Archduke vnto them, to gouerne them, but he excused himselfe. And the Valachians being oppressed by the Polonois, Polonois, demanded Michel their Palatin, or Despot, or some other, for that they would not obey the Moldauians Brother, whome the Polonois had giuen them for their Despot: wherewith the Emperour was much troubled, as you shall heare hereafter.

About this time, there were 2000. souldiars, most of them Walouns and French, which were mutined in Pappa (a fort of importance) for that their pay stayed too long, making a cruell reuolt, whereof sixe among them were the cheefe Authors. First they elected one called La Mot for their Cheefe, and forced the rest to consent, else they would kill them: Their conspiracie was to yeeld vnto the Turke, and to that end they had taken Michael Marot their Gouernour prisoner, and others that commanded in the fort, to de-liuer them vnto the Turkes: They set all the Turkish prisoners at libertie, and sent them to Alba regalis, promising the Turkes to deliuer them Schwartzbouurg: or if he would not trust them, they would shew them the meanes to take him in Kolnock, whether hee should come to bring their money. Schwartzbouurg had intelligence thereof, yet some of the Traitors inuited him by their letters to come, promising to open him the gates: being come, the kept him, and fought to surprise him: so as hee was forced to send Captaine Scharpfenfein with the Cannon, to force them the 22. of Iune. The Traitors receiued carts laden with prouision from the Turkes, and deliuered them Christian prisoners, which they carried away to Vesprin and Alba regalis with great treacherie & cruelty, euery one deliuering vp his Host.

In the meane time Michael Marot, aduertised Schwartzbouurg to come himselfe to beseege Pappa, for that the Traitors were at diuision among themselves, killing one another: Schwartzbouurg goes & takes one of these trecherous Captaines at a fallie, causing him to bee head aliue, and his head to be set on the end of a Pike, to strike terror into the rest: They also take a Bastion from them by force, by the which they might let in Turkish iectors, who did all they could to succour them, the which they could not effect, by reason of the great floods, and the resistance of the Christians. The Traitors being famished, and in great want of all things, grew desperate, desiring rather to die then to yeeld and be executed. Among others they make one fallie in the night, the last of Iuly, and charge Marsbourgs quarter, where finding the souldiars dronke, they defeated many, and put the whole Campe in armes. Schwartzbouurg (a braue and valiant Captaine) going to giue order for this tumult, was slaine with a shot, to the great grief of all the Christians. Notwithstanding his death, the seege was continued, & the Traitors defended themselves desperately, making a fallie the next day, carrying many prisoners into the Towne, with some Captaines, and slue three hundred: And being persuaded to yeeld, they answered, that when all their victualls were spent, they would eate their prisoners, yea and Michael Marot the Gouernour.

The Emperour giue the charge of this army to Melchior Reder, who had brauely defended Paradin. The Traitors seeing they could hold no longer, fore-cast how they might fle and the 30. of August they dried vp a poole, which did enuiron Pappa of one side, and for that the bottome did sinke, they did cast Hardles, Strawe, and other baggage into it. Reder aduertised hereof, sends Nadasse, the Count Thurin, and Colonitz to surprise them. The Traitors flying, had already gotten vnto a wood at the end of the Poole, where they ouertooke them, and refusing to yeeld, some of them were cut in

A in peeces: And among others, la Motte their Captaine with a hundred more were slaine: Their Mediator with the Turkes was taken, with many of the chiefe of the Treason. In the meane time Marot the Gouernour, whom the Traitors had put in prison, being freed from his bonds, gets forth with others and comes to the Campe.
Reder by this meanes enters into Pappa, and deliuers the other prisoners. At this entry many of the Traytors were slaine, some were referued for execution, and were sent to other Garrisons, to serue for an example. Some were Impaled, others broken vpon the Wheele, and scorched with a small fire, and basted with Lard, some had their Bowells pulled out off their Bellies and burnt before their faces, and their thighes, shoulders and other parts of their Bodies scorched: some had their Hearts pulled out aliue; others had their throats filled with Sulpher and Pouder, and set on fire: some were buried aliue, vp to the chinne, and ther heads broken with Bullets, euery one by order of Martiall Lawe, to make them apprehend by the severity of their deaths, the foulness of their treason. Which diuersity of seuer punishments (seeming to tend to cruelty) was very necessary, to make all Christians abhorre treason.

The Lords of Sillery and Alinecourt by the Popes aduice, and the Kings commandement, went from Rome to Florence, to treat a marriage betwixt the King and the Noble Princeesse Mary of Medeis, the which had bene prebanded before. This demand was so pleasing vnto the great Duke, as he made no difficulty. Her Portion was six hundred thousand Crowns (comprehending that which the Great Duke had lent the King, of the which he paid himselfe) with Jewells and other precious moueables. The Contract was past in the Pallace of Pitty, the 25. day of Aprill, in the presence of Charles Anthony Putei Archbishop of Pisa, and Virginio Duke of Bracciano. All Florence shewed great ioy thereat, and the Princeesse was presently declared Queene of France. She dyed publicly vnder a cloth of Estate, the great Duke sitting farre beneath her. The Duke of Bracciano gaue her Water, and Sillery the Kings Ambassador the Towell. The rest of the day was spent in all kind of sports. Soone after Monsieur Alinecourt went to carry these good newes vnto the King, with the Queenes picture, which the great Duchesse sent him. The King sent Frontenac, to serue the Queene as her cheefe Steward, who presented vnto her his Maiesties first Letter, and withall he sent his Portrait to the great Duke. The King resolved to effect the promises of Marriage, as soone as the Duke of Sauoy had performed his, touching the Restitution or the Exchange of the Marquisate of Salusses, and to go to Auznon to receiue the Queene: but the Duke was much perplexed what hee should doe.

After the Duke of Sauoyes departure the King went to passe the Lent at Fontain-bleau, where there was a great Conference betwixt the Bishop of Eureux and Philip de Mornay Lord of Plessis Marly, Gouernour of Saumur, Intendent of the house and Crowne of Nauarre: in the presence of the King, Princes and Officers of his Crowne, Councillors of State, Prelats and other Noblemen of marke. It was touching a booke which Monsieur du Plessis had published of the Institution of the Lords Supper, and against the Masse, wherein the Bishop did taxe him to haue falsified many Authorities. Wherevpon du Plessis presented a Petition vnto the King, that his Ma-iesty would be pleased to appoint Commissioners to examine euery passage of Scripture cited in his booke. The King yeilded to this Conference, that the truth might be made cleare against the darkness of slander, referring the care thereof to his Chancellor. The Commissioners appointed for the Catholiks were Augustin Thuanus President of the Court Parliament at Paris: Pithou, Aduocate in the Court, and Feuere Schoolemaister to the Prince of Condé, in whose absence came Martin the Kings Phisition. And for the other, the President of Calignon, Chancellor of Nauarre, in whose place entred de Fresnes Gauaye, President of the Chamber of Languedoc, and Casabon, his Maiesties Reader for the Greeke tongue. All singular Men in learning and tonges.
This conference began the 4. of May, in the Hall at Fontainbleau in the midst whereof 1600. was a Table of a reasonable length. At the one end sat the King, on his right hand the Bishop of Eureux, and on the left, right against him Du Plessis, Pasquier, L'Espine, Mercier, Secretaries of the Conference were at the lower end of the same Table. Some what higher on the Kings right hand sat the Chancellor & the Comptroller. Behind the King stood the Archbishop of Lions, and the Bishops of Nevers, Beauvais and Chastres. On the Kings left hand, were the foure Secretaries of State. Behind them which conferred, were the Dukes of Flandermont, of Normandie, of Alencon, of Mayenne, of Nevers, of Eibeuf, of Aiguillon and of Tonnelle, the Officers of the Chamber, Councillors of State, and other Noblemen of quality. After that all were commanded to keepe silence, his Maiefty hauing said, that the Dispute was not betwixt party and party, but particular betwixt the two Conferences, not for any question of Right and Doctrine, but for the literall trueth of some passages: and that he desired they should Treat with al Mildnes and Moderation, without any bitterness or p. sion, but that of the truth. Declaring moreover that he did not meane that this dispute, should in any thing alter or disquiet the Peace of his Subjects, as the Chancellor did then declare vnto them at large by the Kings commandement.

After the first dayes Conference, Monsieur du Plessis fell very sicke, so as they could proceed no further. The King did write the same day, vnto the Duke of Espernon, that had past in this Conference, and shewed by his Letter what his iudgement was. My friend, the Diocesse of Eureux hath vanquished that of Saumur. Wherevith Monsieur du Plessis was discontented, so as in a discourse which he (or some of his friends) had put into one after, touching this Conference, he termed this Letter A Sparke of fire, and that the Bishop of Eureux Fly, was made an Elephant. The King had particular advice that the Duke of Sauoy was irrefolute what to do, and that he had sent vnto the Pope, and to diuers Princes and Common weales in Italy, to let them vnderstand that he had bene forced to the Treaty of Paris, and how much it did import them if this Treaty were effected: but he found not their intentions to iumpe with his, neither had he the answer which he expected. His Maiefty had also intelligence of his deepe displeasing, saying somtimes; That he would not restore the Marquisate, but by force; sometimes, that he had rather deliuer Breffe then the Marquisate; and most commonly hee would say, that he would restore the Marquisate; and that with a double dessein. The one was that the King (thinking he proceeded faithfully) would graunt him some delay for the restitution of the Marquisate, during the which, and before that the King should leaue an Army, Winter should come, the which would hinder the French from attempting of any thing against him this yeare. The other was, to the end that the King of Spaine and his Council (who apprehended about all, the Restitution of the Marquisate, for the neighebourhood of the French, to the Duchie of Milun) should grant vnto Leij the Dukes Chancellor and his Ambassador in Spaine (whiche he had sent him expressly to pacifie the Spaniards, who were offended with the Dukes voyage into France, treachors of Men, and money in case the King would force him: or else that hee might draw some recompence from the Spaniard for the exchange of Bresse with the Marquisate. Bely complaines to the Council of Spaine, of the little time which they remayned for the Restitution of the Marquisate to the French, to whom they answered, That armyes were not to loone leuiued in France; that hee should assure the Duke his Master, that the Count de Fuentes should be at Milun by August (whereas two millions of sold attended him) with so many men and other provision, as who soeuer should seeke to force him, should haue enough to do to defend himselfe.

The King being well aduertised of all these practises; The first of Iune beeing past, by the which the Duke according to the Treaty of Paris should restore the Marquisate, his Maiefty came to Lions; where the Duke intreated him by his Letters to giue him some dayes of respite, & that he would satisfie him by his Ambassadors. Wherevnto the King yeelded. The Archbishop of Tarantaise, the Marquis of Lullins and Rencas his Ambassadors came to Lions, the 16. of Iuly. Who sayd vnto the King.

The

A That the Duke their Maister did complaine of the treatie of Paris, that he durst not refuse any thing to his Maistie, when as he was in the chiefe City of his Realme; that he might be more blamed for holding of the accord then in breaking it, for the great interest of himselfe, his Children and his Countries; Norwithstanding he was ready to yeeld the Marquisate, but he beseeched his Maiefty to graunt him the Inuestiture of it for one of his Sonnes.

The King answered them. That the Duke had written many letters vnto him from Chambery and Thurin, aduertising him that he was very well pleased with the accord which he had made at Paris, promising to effect it, as he was bound to doe. As for his Demand of the Inuestiture of the Marquisate for one of his Sonnes, there was no likelihood he should vse any such Liberalitie, hauing so small cause. To conclude, he was much discontented with the difficulties which the Duke made vpon their accord, the which if he did not performe by the first day of August, he should prepare to defend himselfe. Rencas the Dukes confident seruant returns to his Highnes, to let him vnderstand the Kings discontent & resolution: but especially to giue him time to thinke of his affaires. At that time Fosseuse returning out of Piedmont, assured the King, that he had heard the Duke of Sauoy sweare, that he would neuer yeeld vp the Marquisate, and if the King did attempt to make warre against him, he would throw him sport for fortie yeares, with such like words which were vnpleasing to the King. Rencas returns speedily, bringing new that the Duke was content, seeing the King would haue it so, to restore the Marquisate of Saluces, according to the treatie of Paris. The King seemed well pleased with this resolution, giuing the charge to Brulart and Janin to treat with the Dukes Ambassadors, how the restitution of the Marquisate should be made. The articles were agreed vpon, and being readie to signe them, Rencas laide vnto the Ambassadors, that his master might take it ill, if they should signe them before hee had seene them: that there were diuers humors about his Highnes, & that it would be more easie for him to get him to approue the Articles when they were not signed, Rencas takes vpon him to carry the Articles, the King hauing liuen him heaue to goe, and knowe his Masters last resolution, shewing that he was determined not to suffer himselfe to be entertained any longer with words, but in steed of returning, he sent backe a letter whereby they found that the Duke did nothing but dessemble, and keepe the King occupide, vntill that the Count de Fuentes came out of Spaine, and that he had assembled his forces and provided for his safety.

But the Archebishop of Tarantaise and Lullins entering againe into conference with the said Presidents of Sillery and Janin, they propounded foure difficulties. 1. Vpon the restitution of places in the Marquisate, by the Duke, and of Pont de vaux in Bresse by the King, at the same time. 2. Vpon the restitution of the Baillevicke of Gex. 3. Vpon the restitution of the Artillerye and Munition that was within Cormagnole. 4. Vpon the nomination of a Gouvernor in the Marquisate. All which being reloued, the Dukes Ambassadors beseech the King to giue them time to aduertise their Master thereof, the King answered them that if by the sixteene of August all his places in the Marquisat were not restored vnto him, that he would seeke to recouer that by force which he could not haue by reason. Before the kings departure from Paris, the Diuill had perfwaded a wretched woman called Nicole Mignon, to poyson him, who had some means during the forepassed warres, she had had the fauour to talke priuately with the King who is as full of Bounty, as the Libertie of armes, in time of warre, giues such familiarities: & Princes some times frame themselves vnto it. Being kept back from the Kings presence, with whom she would needs speake in priuate, being full of indignation and hauing resolved this cruell attempt against the King, she adresteth her selfe to the Count Soissons a Prince of the bloud and Lord Steward of France, that he might giue her husband some place in the Kings Kitchin, and so in going to see her husband, she should haue meanes to effect her damnable enterprize. In the ende she had acceffe and said vnto him, that she was resolved to doe an act, which should make him the greatest Prince, and her the most contented woman in the world. He desired to vnderstand

1600 of her the meanes in particular, whereat hee was much amazed. And for that it was a matter of importance hee wished her to come againe the next day, forthwith deferred to bee well considered of. The Count of Soissons goes presently vnto the King, and telles him what hee had heard of this Woman, beeching him to giue him some confident man, who beeing shut vp in his Cabinet might heare the same, when as shee should come at the time appointed. The King commanded Lomenye Secretaire of his Cabinet to goe. Shee returnes full of Courage and Resolution to effect this wicked deseing. She speaks more and protests to do worse then shee had done the day before. Hee prest her to tell who had councelled her, and while shee attempted so dangerous a thing. Hee could draw nothing from her but that it proceeded from the Devil, from whom comes all damnable inspirations, and whose actions are Murthers, Sacriledges and Impieties: When shee had all sayd, shee was apprehended by the Pronost, and led vnto the Court. Being examined, shee denied the accusation and reproched the accuser as audaciously, as shee had shewed her selfe furiously resolute to the execution. Lomenye was produced against her, and her conscience (although verie desperately wicked) could not deny that which hee had before time depofed, but confessed the truth, and was condemned to bee burned quicke.

It is miraculous what hath past in diuers conspiracies against the King, and howe Dammie God hath deliuered him. It was one of the causes, which made the Duke of Sauoye seeme so resolute to hold the accord which hee had made with the King at Paris, for the Marquise of Saluces, hauing vnderstood that the King had beene so often threatened by the attempts of such Murtherers, presuming that it was not possible but some one would hit: and about the same time there was one taken, come out of Flamont to kill the King, whereof their was great rumor and great suspicion. And three others which had vndertaken to kill the King, when as he was in Sauoye, whereof they had certaine intelligence, with their portraites, the which were well knowne. And as they would haue taken them, his Maiesty would not suffer them saying. Let these wicked wretches alone, God will punish them without my doing.

Those of Zeland finding themselves much oppressed by the sixe Gallies which Ieronimo Spinola a Marchant of Genoa had obtayned of the King of Spaine (in satisfaction of money which hee had lent) and the which (notwithstanding the States Shippes of Ware which lay in the narrowe Seas) hee had brought into Schuse, to make Ware against them, besides the great losses they suffered daylie by them of Dunkerke, as well in their fishing for Herring, as in their trade of Marchandise, they intreate the Generall Estates of the United Provinces (seeing there was no more danger towards Holland nor Guelderland by the taking of the Forts of Saint Andrewe and Crene-caur) to helpe to free them from those Gallies and them of Dunkerke, and by that meanes to diuert the Ware from Holland and Guelderland into Flanders, to the Sea Townes of Dunkerke, Nieuport and Schuse. The Arch-dukes old regiments of Spaniards and Italians, were all mutined for their paie, which could not bee by some nor so easily pacified the arerages beeing to great, and therefore very likely if they entred into Flanders with all their Armie, there would not bee any to hinder their deffense: hoping they should get one of the sayd three Townes before that the Arch-dukes Armie should bee readie. All well debated, and the resolution taken, the Prince sent vnto the Sea Townes of Holland, Zeland, and Frisland for as many Shippes as should serue to imbarke his Army, his Artillery, victuall and other munition for the Ware, assigning to euerie one his quarter, and time to come to the Generall Rendez-vous, to the number of two thousand and eight hundred sayle of all sorts, the like whereof hath not heerebefore beene seene in any expedition in the Lowe Countries.

All which Shoppes lying before the Caste'l of Ramekens, to attend a fit winde to carry them to Ostende, vpon the Coast of Flanders, which holds for the States, there to land,

A land, hauing nothing but a Northerly winde all the time of their anchoring there, 1600 with the which they could hardly reach to that Towne: The Prince fearing that their long stay there, might giue the Arch-duke Albert time to gather together his forces, before they should bee entred into Flanders, leauing Zeland heimbarked the 19. of Iune in his Pinasse. The same day hee caused about 1500. Shippes to set sayle, leauing the rest to attend a winde fit to carry them to Ostende. The same night hee anchored with his army before Bieroliet, the which is a small Iland vpon the coast of Flanders, not farre from Sas (which is the Schuse of Gant going to the Sea) from whence hee sent Count Ernest of Nassau his Cousin, with some Shippes and men, to land neere vnto the fort of Philippine, held by the Spaniards, to seize thereon, the which was presently yielded by composition, to depart with their Rapiers and Daggers by their sides, the which was done the same night. The Prince hauing landed with his army and vewed it, leauing the Forts of Patience and Tsendike neere vnto him, the 23. of the same month, hee marched from Philippine towards Affencde, where the Caste'l beeing sommoned yielded presently, the fouldiars departing with their armes and baggage. The foure and twentieth day the Prince came within a League of Bruges, and the same day the winde being good to go to Ostend, forty Shippes laden with baggage, remayning at Rameken, set saile being waited by three Shippes of Ware: but the Galleis of Schuse tooke eighteene or twenty of them, which the Shippes could not hinder, nor yet pursue them to recouer the losse.

C Prince Maurice marched in Battaile with his army through Flanders. The 26. hee passed neere vnto the ditches of Bruges, & the next day he came vnto Oudenbourg, the which was abandoned by the Spaniard, with the forts of Snakerke, Bredene and some other Skonces here and there, for that they were not to hold against so mighty an army. The 29. hee besieged the Fort of Albert neere to Ostend, the which was yielded vp: and from thence hee went presently to Nieuport, which he desired to take before the Arch-duke should haue meanes to hinder him. The Arch-duke hauing intelligence that the Prince was entred with his army into Flanders, sent post vpon post: writing to the Spaniards that were mutined, and to other troupes: Hee Praies, Intreats, Threatens, Promiseth, Exhorts, layes before them their Faith, and accuserh them, if they faile him at this neede, to be causers of his ruine & of their owne: so as in fewe daies they gather together an army of 12000. foote and about 3000. horse, with the which the Arch-duke marched to Oudenbourg, the which was yielded vp by Colonel Piron, who aduertised Count Maurice (lying before Nieuport) of the taking thereof, and that the Arch-duke was in person in his army, and ment to fight with him: wherevpon he sent the sayd Colonell Piron with his men, to ioyne with Count Ernest of Nassau & the Scottishmen, to keepe the Spaniard from passing of a bridge betwixt Nieuport, and Ostend, or at the least to stay him vntill the Prince might repasse the Hauens with his army and retire his Shippes as hee did. The Earle being vpon the way towards the bridge, with two peeces of Cannon, found that a part of the enemies army was past: against the which hee must fight, to stay them a while: but as the Spaniards increased, the Earle was forced to retire, hauing lost his two peeces of Canon, and about 800. men, most of them Scottish. The Captaines and fouldiars which were taken prisoners, were miserably slaine against the faith giuen. Count Ernest, Colonel Edmond and other Captaines, were pursued vnto Albertus fort, where they faued themselves.

The Arch-duke pursuing this victory, past his whole army at the bridge, causing it to march along the Sea sands, hauing eight peeces of Artillery, with nine companies of Lances, five cornets of Harguebuziers on horse-backe: five of Curiaffes, and 600. Spanish and Italian horses mutined at Diesl, three regiments of Spanish foote, two of Italians, five of Wallons: two of Bourguignons, foure of Germaines, and some companies of the regiment of Count Frederic of Berghe, they marched directly towards Nieuport, with an intent to charge the Prince and the States army, in their Campe and trenches, assuring themselves of a victory by the mornings good successe. But he found that the enemy had passed the Hauens, and that his army was in good disposition to attend him, who

1600. (seeing the Archdukes countenance,) had without any amazement for his first loss, put his armie into battaile, according to his little leisure. Count Lewis of Nassau his Cousin, brother to Count Erneste, Lieutenant of the States Horse, had the leading of the Vantgard: Count George Euerard of Solme commanded the battaile, in the midst whereof was Count Maurice, who had an eye to all places, beeing accompanied by Count Henry Frederic his brother, a yong Prince of the age of sixteen or seuteene yeares. And the Reerward was led by Oliuer de Timpel knight, Lord of Corbeke. On the other side the Archdukes old and best experienced Capitaines, seeing the Princes resolute countenance, and the disposition of his army to be otherwise then they expected, standing in battaile, and their shippes in the midst of the Sea, they began to doubt, perfwading not to fight, for that their Souldiars began to bee weary, with five or sixe dayes long marches, and with the first fight before noon, but rather to seeke to recouer Albertus fort, and thereabouts to intrench all the armie, and to cut off the victuals from the Princes Campe, cooping him in betwixt Nieuport, their armie and the Sea: the which had bene the better Councell for them, and most prejudiciall for the Prince. But the Archduke and some other Commanders, putt vp with their first victorie, and burning with desire to fight, resolved to charge the Prince, at what price soeuer. The Prince after that hee had viewed the Spaniards countenance, did resolve with the aduise of his Commanders and Colonells, to aduance and charge the enemy. Having therefore incouraged his souldiars to shew their valour, and to reuenge the death of their Companions so cruely massacred, against the publike Law at armes, he commanded Mortier and Fresnel, two Commissaries of the Artillerie, to discharge sixe peeces, which were in the head of the Foreward, the which past through the Spanish horse, and at the same instant, the Archdukes Cannon playd through the English troups. In the end, after a long and doubtful fight, the Spaniards were defeated, and euery man sought to saue himselfe, some towards Nieuport, and others to other places, whereas they found easiest access. The Archduke seeing this disorder, fled to Bruges. The States had an absolute victorie, and the slaughter of the vanquished was great, especially of the mutined Spaniards which fought obstinately, so as few escaped: yea some prisoners were massacred in their armes that had taken them, who would gladly haue saued them: for there was no mercie in the Scottishmen, who slue all they met, for an expiation of the death of their Companions, murdered in the morning in cold blood: so as they said that the Archduke lost about sixe thousand men, and seven or eight hundred prisoners, whose liues were saued with great difficultie: yea the Admirall of Arragon being led prisoner towards the Prince, had bene in great danger of his life, entring into Ostende, if hee had not bene neere the Prince.

The States, as well in the encounter in the morning, as in the battell, lost about two thousand men, amongst the which were three Capitaines of Horse, & twenty of Foot, but not any Nobleman of accopt. On the Archdukes side died the Count de Saume, the Seneschall of Montlimar, who being prisoner and sore wounded, died soone after his taking at Ostend, the Barron of Pimereul Sonne to the Treasurer Chassey, the Seigneur of Ottigny Sonne to the President Richardot, Don Gaspar de Sapena a Colonell, who died in Ostend. Don Diego de Torres, Don Gaspar de Loyaza, Don Gonzalo Spinola, Don Ioan de Pardo, Don Garcia de Toledo, Don Lopes de Capata, Don Alonso de Carcano, Don Louys Eacardo, Sebastian Velasco, Sebastian Doteloa, Christouall Verdugues, Matheo d'Otenil, Ioannetin de Casa noua, the Contador d' Alimes and many others. There were taken prisoners Don Francisco de Mendoza Marquis of Guadaleste, Great Admirall of Arragon, and the Archdukes Lieutenant Generall, Don Baptista de Villa noua, who were led to Horne in Holand. Don Alonso Requell to Delfe, Don Gonzalo Hernandez de Spinosato to Vtrecht, Don Pedro de Montenegro, and Don Philip de Tuffis to the Hage, Don Pedro de Velasco, to Bergh, Don Pedro de Lenjinato Encusen, Don Anthony de Mendoza, and Don Francisco de Torres to Bergh. Of the Archdukes household

A household were taken, the Count Carlo Rezi, Don Diego De Gusman and Mortier, all three being his pages, and Don Pedro de Montemaior, his Gentlemen Caruer, his Philition, Surgian, Harbinger, Rider, Cooke, Porter, and Groome of his Chamber, some of his Gardes &c. fortie seauen Ancients, and thertie seauen appointed and reformed Sargents. The Archduke lost sixe peeces of Artillery, and with the two which they had taken in the morning a hundred and sixe Enseignes, and sixe Cornets, comprehending the munniers Standard, & the Colours which were lost that day were also recovered. Five daies after this Battaille, the Prince returns againe to the seege of Nieuport, having passed the Hauen againe, hee caused his Shippes to returne; intrenched his Campe, vnshipps his Cannon, and prepared his Batteries: but the same night there entred three Regiments into the Towne, the which they could not preuent, besides sixe Companies which were there in Garrison before, so as the Prince finding it very difficult to take the Towne by assault, without greater forces and a long seege, considering the number of their men, the which might greatly preiudice his affaires and little aduantage him by the taking thereof, beeing in danger vpon his departure to be taken againe, hee raised his Campe and imbarked his Cannon with all the Baggage Tentes, and Paultions, commanding the Shippes to returne towards Ostend, having resolved to attempt the Ports of Isabella, Saint Clara, and Grotendorst: so as the next day having past the Hauen of Nieuport hee went to beleege the Fort of Isabella, neere to that of Albertus which hee had taken at his coming to Ostend, but the one and twentieth day of the month, at the breake of day, the Archdukes army beeing newe supplied, appeered and set downe neere vnto the Fort of Clara without any opposition: so as the Archduke sent to refresh the sayd Forts both with Men and Munition, the which the Prince could not hinder by reason of the great dirches which were in the Meadows: so as the Prince (finding that he was to fight with two enemies if he should assaile the Fort) made his retreat, contenting himselfe for that yeare with the victory of Nieuport, so as hee was blamed of many for that hee could not make vse of so great a victory.

Count Maurice and the States having demanteled Albertus Forte, as much as they thought good, and raised the seege from that of Isabella they returned with their Armie into the vnited Prouinces, putting them into Garrisons, and the Archduke retired the Boeie of his Army out of Flanders, except some Companies which hee left within the Forts, repaying that of Albertus againe in the same manner, as it had bin before. Wakenoe the Archdukes Vice-admirall, (remayning commonly in the Towne of Dunkerke) to reuenge the losse at the Battaille of Nieuport, goes himselfe to Sea with seauen or eight Shippes of Warre, and falls vpon a peece of the Fleete of Holland and Zeeland which went to fish for Herrings; the which although they had some Shippes for their gard disperfed heere and there, yet not beeing able to defend alike, some lying farre of, the Vice-admirall tooke some of them, and hauing taken out the Pilotes and Masters of the Shippes, hee nayled the Mariners and Fishermen vnder the Hatches, in fiftene or sixteene of the aforesayd Shippes, the which hee perced beneath in the Keeles, so as they sunke to the bottom of the Sea, with all those poore distressed wretches, which could no way saue or helpe themselves: a poore reueng, and a pittifull thing to see and heare the lamentable cries of those which were so miserably drowned.

This Sommer the States of the Lowe Countries caused a great Galley to bee Built in the Towne of Dordrecht in Hollande, to stoppe the Passages and courses of them of Seluse, this beeing called the blacke Galley of Dordrecht, hauing ten or twelue peeces of Artillery: whereof there were two Cannons in the Poop and two in the Prowe, it was no sooner finished & manned, but she was sent from Flessingh in Zeeland, to drawe forth the enemies Galleies: whilest she lay at an Anchor, the Capitaine hauing discovered, three Galleies of Seluse which had taken a Marchants Shippe of Zeelande, pursued them, and at the first charged one of the three so furiously, as

after

1600. after great harme done her, she was forced to retire, which done, the Captaine went to the other two who had seized on the ship, the which he tooke from them, and forced them to retire to Seluse; with no lesse losse then the first. And afterwards the night of the 29. day of Nouember, this Captaine with his Galley and foure thalops well manned, set vpon the Admiralls ship of Andwerp, in the midst of the Riuer of Escault, before the said Towne, the which was one of the goodliest shippes belonging to Andwerp, being of the burthen of foure score Tunnes, the which hee did assaile so furiously, as some he cut in peeces, others leaping ouer-board were drowned in the darkenesse of the night. Then he tooke the Marchants shippes of Bruxelles & Mecklin, and fise other shippes (which they call Hoyes) the which did serue to conuoy victualls & munition which went to Seluse, and to the forts which the Spaniards hold vpon the Riuers, euery ship hauing foure peeces of Ordinance: all which shippes with the Prisoners which he retayned, he brought to Flessingue, passing at the mercy of the Spaniards Canon before Ordam & other forts, vpon the Riuer of Escault. The which did much terrifie the Towne of Andwerp, it being kept shut two daies, fearing some treason. Don Francisco de Mendoza, Admirall of Arragon, being taken Prisoner at the battell of Nieuport, and led into Holland, remained in the Castle of Woerden, & could not purchase his liberty for any money, but vpon condition; That in exchange, & in steed of a Ransome, all their Subiects & seruants, that were prisoners in Spaine, Italy, and else where, should be set at liberty. The Admirall seeing that there was no other meanes of his deliuey, but that he was in danger to end his dayes there, preuailed so much with the King of Spaine and Albertus the Archduke, as he obtained a promise, that for him all the prisoners of the vnited Prouinces, or which had bin taken in their seruice, being at that time deteyned, either in the Gallies, in prison or otherwise, should be deliuered without ransome, the which hee should present vnto the States before his full liberty. By reason whereof the States did write vnto all the Townes of the said Prouinces, to deliuer in writing vnto the Comissaries appointed to that end, the names of such as they knew to be detained as well in Spaine by the Inquisition, at the Ilands and Indies, as also in the Low Countries, at Seluse, Dunckerke, & else where, the which was done, and the prisoners being all returned, the Admirall was set at liberty.

The Admirall of Arragon set at liberty in the year 1600.

Earle Gouries a tempt to kill the King of Scotland.

The Duke refused to signe the Articles agreed vpon by his Ambassadors.

The Kings declaration vpon the beginning of the War, against the Duke of Sauoy.

This year the fift of August, was that detestable Conspiracie of the Earle of D Goury and his yonger brother, to murder the King of Scotland: Alexander Ruthen the yonger brother perswaded the King to go vnto the Earles house, where hee would shew him a hidden treasure, but their intent was to murder him most inhumanely; if GOD had not preferred him most miraculously beyond all expectation of man, as you may read at large in the History. But let vs returne to Sauoy. The 7. of August the King was aduertised, that the Duke had refused the last conditions agreed vpon by his Ambassadors, wherevpon he countermanded the Count Passage, whom he had sent with 500. men to command in the Marquise of Salusses, and to enter the Towne and Castle of Carmagnoles, which the Duke should yeeld vp the 16. of August, according to the last accord. And withall the eleuenth of that month he published a declaration how he was forced to take armes against the Duke of Sauoy, to haue reason for the Marquise of Salusses, taken by him, and vsurped vpon the Crowne of France, in a time of Peace, during the life of the deceased King, Henry the 3. Predecessor to his Maiesty, & a Benefactor to the said Dukes Father: Giuing all me to vnderstand, that he was vnwillingly drawne to this remedy, for the singurall desire he had to raigne in Peace, and to liue in Loue & friendship with all his neighbours, hauing done as much to auoide it, as his honour, and the duty of a Prince which loues the publike quiet, and the good of his Estate, did require: taking into his protection & defence, all Clergy men & places, which shou'd not fauour, nor serue for a retreat or assistance vnto the said Dukes armies: & all Inhabitants of Townes, which should open their gates vnto his Maiesty and to his seruants: Meaning, that no actes of Hostility should be vsed, but against such as should carry armes, & fauour the said Duke of Sauoy and his adherents. Forbidding all Sacriledge, Rauishing of Women and Maides, and burning

A burning of Houses, Places and Castles vpon paine of death. Commanding al Frenchmen his subiects, being in seruice with the said Duke, to retire themselves and returne into his Realme within fiftene dayes after this Proclamation made in his armies, vpon paine to be declared and punished as guilty of heigh Treason. The King finding that all the Dukes temporisings and delayes proceeded from a bad intent, was forced at one and the same instant, against the Precept of Warre, to proclaime Warre, and to prepare for meanes to make it. He gaue out Commissions for the leuying of foot in the neighbour Prouinces. He sent the Duke of Guise into Prance, to looke to his Government, hauing intelligence that the Duke practised some surpris. The Marshall Biron had charge to drawe downe all his forces out of Burgundy, he caused bullets to be made in Niurnois, Dauphiné and Burgundy, and sent out Commissions for to leay Pioners. The Marquis of Kosny great Master of the Artillery, was sent to Paris, who returned within fiftene dayes to his Maiesty, with incredible speede, to as in lesse then three weekes, the King had Men, Money, Canon and Munition. He sent Monsieur d'Ichis Ambassador speedily into Suisse with money, to preuent and disaptent the Dukes practises, and to assure a leny of Suisse at neede.

The Kings Preparations for Warre.

The King who knows that in Warre, nothing doth so much aduance the execution as the presence of the Head: being resolute to assaile the Duke on two parts, by Bresse and Sauoy, he parted from Lions the same day that he proclaime Warre, and came to Grenoble to go to the Enterprize of Montmelian in Sauoy, and to be perfect at all occasions. The Marshall Biron undertooke the Surprize and Taking of Fourg in Bresse, the which was as soone knowne as conceived. The Marquis of Lullins the Dukes Ambassador being at Lions, aduertised the Count of Mont-maior Governor of Bresse, and Bonnens, Captaine of the Cittadell of Beurg of the Enterprize, and that they should stand vpon their Gards. A Gentleman of Bresse which had bene among the Marshall Birons Troupes, seene the Petards, and numbered the Souldiers in passing the Bridge at Maicon, went before, to giue notice to Bonnens Captaine of the Cittadell, that the Marshall was within a league of him. But neglecting all these aduertisements, and trusting to the force of their Walles and Gates, they found, that the Marshall Biron with 1200. men onely and two Petards, forced the first and second Port of the Towne, and entred it without any Resistance, or the losse of one Souldiar. The troupes entred without disorder, and marched directly to the place before the Cittadell, and came not away, til ten of the clock, whilst that they did capitulate with 200. Suisse, which had shut themselves into a Bastion, whom they suffered to depart free with what was theirs: and also to attend if Bonnens would fall out off the Cittadell, as he made shewe. The Marshall Biron left the Barron of Lux at Fourg, and went with fise Canons to finish the conquest of all that which lyes on this side the Riuer of Kosne, taking at the same time Pont d'In, Poncin, S. Denis, S. Rumbert, Beley and Pierre Chastel. Some yelded at the reputation of his presence, others would see the Canon. There was no Garrison in all the Country, but at Seizel. A strange humour of an enemy, not onely to make Warre vpon bad grounds, and to imbarle himselfe in a rotten Shippe, but also to refuse Peace, and yet to haue no man in his Country to make Warre. Those which made any resistance, shewed themselves in the end more valiant in Tongue then with the Sword. So as the King being at Grenoble, receiued in one day and in lesse then fixe houres, newes of two memorable exploits: the taking of Bourg with seuen Ensignes, and one Cornet which the Marshall sent him, and the taking of the Towne of Montmelian by les Diguies. Cregny offered a Scalado to the Curtaine of the Towne of Montmelian, towards the Castell, and the Petard to the Port of Arban with such a fury, as the Souldiers retired themselves into the Church, and the Inhabitants into the Cittadell, leaving their houses to the discretion of all that Warre allowes in a Towne that is either forced, or surprisid. The King commanded Grillon to lodge with the Regiment of his Gardes in the suburbs of Chambery, all which was done, without any great resistance.

The

The soldiars did not defend themselves without feare and amazement, and the people were so lulled a sleepe with this opinion of Peace, as nothing was more hatefull vnto them then the remembrance of Warre, holding all care of armes to be vaine and vnprofitable. The Duke being aduertised that the King was in armes, his Country in prey, the meanes to defend himselfe farre off, the danger at hand, and Hannibal at the foote of the Alpes, found no fitter instrument to repaire his affaires then the Patriarke of Constantinople, who since his returne from Paris had remained at Thurin in the Couent of the Franciscans. The Duke had bin iealous of him at the Treaty at Paris, and seeing that by the Popes commandement, he would not depart before it were effected: he thought that it was but to spie his intentions, and to presse him to do that in effect, which hee would not do but in wordes. Hee therefore shewed him no such good countenance as hee had done when hee past first for the Treaty of Vernins. His friends, which did visit him were not held good seruants to the Duke: hee discomfited well this contempt, but hee dissembled the feeling of it. The Duke who had offended him, gaue him a good meanes to be reuenged. Hee intreats and coniures him to go vnto the King. They say that (in despite of the bad recepcion hee had had at Thurin, or well acquainted with the Dukes intentions) he sent a small noate vnto the King, aduising him to continue the course of his armes, and not to desist for any propositions or offers made by the Duke, who sought but to deceiue him, and withall hee accepted of the charge.

The Patriarke came vnto Grenoble the 15. of August, & spake vnto the King coming from Euenfong. He giues him to vnderstand how much the Pope would be discontented with this Warre: hee coniures him in his name to resolue to a Peace, and to turne for that effect to the Treaty of Paris: for that in demanding his owne, both the Pope and all the Potentates would fauour his demand: but in seeking to retaine the ancient inheritance of the Duke of Sauoye, hee had no reason to hope for any fauour. The King answered him, that hee was infinitely greeued the Pope should bee any way discontented with his taking of armes, the which hee did not vndertake vntill it was apparent to all the world, that the Duke deluded him. That being the person whom his Maiesty did most Honor, and to whom he acknowledged himselfe so much bound, as he could not deny him any thing, yet hee held him so full of Iustice, as he would neuer aduise him to any thing that should be against reason & the dignity of his Crowne. That the Duke hauing refused to performe the Articles of the Treaty at Paris, he was not bound to obserue them. The Patriarke layed before him the miseries which this Warre would bring, the ruine and desolation of the people, and the aduantage which the common enemy of Christendome should get by it. The King answered him in this manner. You exhort mee like vnto a great Diuine and one of the chiefe Prelats of the Church, to desist from this Warre, to auoide the mischife that may fall vpon Christendome. I knowe not so much Diuinity as you do, yet am I not ignorant, that I haue a Soule to saue, and that one day I must giue an account of my actions, and that God will impute the miseries that shall happen by this Warre, vnto him that giues the occasion. Let the Duke of Sauoye lay his hand vpon his heart, and iudge if it bee not his obstinacy and couetousnes to hold that which belongs to another, which is the cause of all the oppression which his poore Subiects do now suffer. Hee hath presumed with two great contempt of me, to hold that which is mine by cunning, against my will. Hee that detaynes an other mans vniustly, may iustly be deprived of his owne. Hee that denies vnto the stronger that which belongs vnto him, abandons vnto him by the same meanes all that he hath: as it is no Honour for him to bee obstinate to Warre, for the desire hee hath to hold an other mans estate, so shall hee reape no other profit then the ruine of his owne. I cannot conceale it, Reuerend Patriarke, that although I haue euer found all integrity in your Negotiations, yet am I troubled howe I shall carry my selfe with you, touching that which you propounde, for in truth I hold you for a very good man, a most vertuous Prelate, and a Wise Negotiator.

On

For the other side I can let you see in writing how the sayd Duke hath giuen authority to Jacob and the President Rochette to treat with mee, with a declaration that neither you nor his Ambassadors, that are within my Realme, are priue to his intentions. Hee hath made them propound, that I should moue the Pope to depute two Legats, one of them should cause restitution to be made of that which I hold on this side the mountaines, and the other should make him restore that which hee detaynes from mee on that side the Alpes. I find his manner of proceeding to bee very bad. To conclude reuerend Patriarke, I will beseech the Pope to take my answer in good part, who holds that I cannot bee voyged by any reason to lay aside those armes which the Duke hath forced me to take, making run headlong without any necessitie into this warre, in the which I am engage against my will. I meane not to bee irreconcilable to him, but I will tell you that hee hath carried himselfe in such sort towards me, as I will no more relie vpon his wordes. After so many breaches, he must finde some other meanes to warrant that hee hath, or some others then my selfe to beleue him. His former carriage makes me iudge what the future may be. It is euident that in a full peace, hee vnrped the Marquisate of Saluces, of the deceased King his benefactor, alleadging no other reason, but that he would keepe it more safely for him, then the Huguenots, who would vnrpe it, promising to doe as hee pleased. I can shew his letter written vnto the King. But when there is any question to keepe his promise, hee then no more remembers it. Iudge also how I can bee assured of the loue of this Prince, who during the miseries of France, sought to vnrpe Dauphiné and Prouence, where with his friends he hath caused infinite ruines, and where hee pretended no other right but neigbourhood and conueniencie, and to make himselfe great with his neighbours losse, so as his Ambassador in Switzerland in an open diet at Basel (excusing his matters couetousnes to the thirteene Cantons) sayd that his children which were many, were issued from Kings and Emperours, and that it was naturall for Fathers to seeke all meanes to make their children great, and to thinke of it in time, seeing that no man knowes what time he hath to thinke of it. The which should giue occasion to al his neighbours, to forecath how they shall keepe their estates vntill his children bee provided for. The warre which I make shall not trouble the quiet of Christendome, I am readie to desist, when hee shall doe mee right, for many iust pretensions which I haue vpon his Estates and Countries, the which he deteines from me, to the preiudice of my Crowne. Let no man doubt of my resolution to obserue the treatie of Vernins, but it doth not binde mee to quit mine owne. The Patriarke seeing that hee would allow no other reasons then his owne, beseeched the King to grant a cessation of armes, but his request was not granted, the King being vnwilling his army should rest, vntill it had taken Montmelian and Bourg, being dangerous to remaine in an enemies Countrey, and not to bee assured of the cheefe places of strength, the losse whereof strikes terror vnto the rest. The King sent the Patriarke to Lions, to treat with his Councell more amply of his proposition.

The Spanish Ambassador considered the course of this warre, yet he made no shew that the King his master desired for all this to alter the publike peace, notwithstanding hee could not forbear to say, that besides the naturall affection which hee bare to the Duke of Sauoy and to his children: hee held it the dutie of a mightie Prince, to lend his helping hand to them that were vniustly oppressed, yet he made no protestation which might make them doubt of the obseruation of the Treatie. The King also sayd that he would cherish the loue of the King of Spain, so long as hee should make account of his, but hee would neuer trouble himselfe with to difficult a thing as to keepe a friend by force. He commanded the Marquis of Lullins to retyre, for if an Ambassador be alwaies suspected during an assured peace, there is no reason to trust him in time of war.

The King being resolute not to lose any time in a season which was so precious, parted from Grenoble, dynd at Barant, visited his troupes which were at Montmelian, and from thence went to the Marches, vewed Chambery, and being come vnto the suburbs, he commanded Villeroy, to speake vnto Jacob, who commanded in the Towne, & to lay lay before him the danger whereinto he thrust himselfe with all the Inhabitants, if they attended force in so weake a place. That the King desirous to prevent the ruine of so many poore innocent Creatures, offered mercy, & sought to vanquish them by mildnesse, before hee employed any other meanes. Jacob, accompanied with the President Rochette, thanked the King, and beseeched his Maiestie to suffer them to aduertise his Highnes in what Estate they were. The King granted them three dayes to resolve and to send to the Duke, but the people not attending his resolution, being desirous to free themselves from the apprehensions of the misery which follows them that are beset, forced him to enter into parlie, so as the Towne was yeelded to the Kings obedience. Those within the Castell promised to yeeld within 6. daies, if they were not succored with sufficient forces to raise the sege. The King left la Buisse a gentleman of Daulphiné there for Gouvernor. Having effected so great a matter with so small forces, hee was well pleased to see his army augmented, by the troupes which La Guiche Gouverneur of Lions brought vnto him, being about 300. horse, of the Nobility of his government, and of his companie of men at armes. Being master of the field, hee resolved to haue the cheefe Fort. hee seized vpon the two approaches of Tarentaise and Morieune. He parted from Chambery the 26. of August, lodged at Saint Peter d' Albigny, and the next day came to Conflans, where hee found that Les Diguieres had by maine force drawne two Cannons to the top of a mountaine, battred a pavillion, and made a small breach in a curtine. The place was sufficient to haue assured Women, but they that were within it shewed not themselves Men, being one thousand five hundred in number, among the which there were a hundred all armed, and three hundred more which carried Cuirasses. They had scarce made fittie shott but they yeelded through feare, and demanded no other composition but their liues, thinking themselves very happy to redeeme their liues with the losse of their Armes, Horses and Baggage, the which the King gaue them out of his bountie, well satisfied with the place, their ensignes, and the promise which they made him not to carrie armes for twelue dayes. As Conflans commands the passage of Tarentaise, so Charbonieres holds that of Morieune, being seated at the entrie of the mountaines, which makes the valley ioyning to Mont Cenis. This place stands vpon a rocke, at the foot whereof runnes the riuer of Are, inaccessible of all sides, but onely a narrow way to goe vnto the Port; this place is held to be the first mansion of the Dukes of Sauoy. The Towne of Aiguebelle is at the foot of this rocke, the King caused it to be surprisid by the Seigneurs of Crequy and Morges, not giuen them of the Castell, any leysure to burne it.

His Maiestie knowing that this place was well furnished to resist an army, caused his troupes to march, and then hee battred the Tower with nine Cannons, and two small peeces, from the breake of day vntill noone. The besieged (hauing endured 637. Cannon shot, without any hope of succors,) did capitulate the tenth of September, to depart with their baggage, & their matches out: the King sent their ensignes to the Marquisse of Vernueil being there at Lions, the which are now in the great Church of S. Iohn, and so they departed to the number of two hundred. The King returned to Grenoble, to purge himselfe by the aduice of his Phisitions, commanding Les Diguieres to passe with the army into Tarentaise, the which he did, the enemies quitting the passage of Briancon, retrying themselves into a rocke which was inaccessible of all parts, the which did so bridle the passage, as it might stay any force: Les Diguieres hauing intelligence that the port being but two foot wide, was not well rampared, & that the place was better furnished with Peasants then with Souldiars, he planted two Canons against it, the which in 6 volles made a breach, the souldiars graped vp courageously to the top of the mountaine, to enter in at this hole, the Captaine within it was hurt with a shott, & all the rest were taken prisoners. The armie lodged at Monliers the Metropolitaine of the whole Countrie, hauing conquered the vallies and mountaines of Morieune and Tarentaise, where they found nothing so difficult, as the season, being more troubled with the weather, then with men: onely Montmelian remayned, which was held impregnable. The King desirous to haue the causes of this warre knowne to all the world; commanded

Amanded his Ambassadors to aduertise his friends thereof. The Spanish Ambassador in Switzerland was not mute in this occasion which ministred matter for althe world to talke of. His discours was, that the King of France (hauing taken armes when as euery one thought to enioye the sweetnes of peace,) put all the world in ieaiousie, bound those that were neerest to runne to quench this fire, and in opoling themselves to the oppression of the Duke, prevent the desseigns of the seruitude of Italy. That to this end the Cont de suentes, had comandment from the King of spaine his Master, to leuie men to assuer the Duchie of Milan, and to intreat that valiant nation of the Swisses to grant him a leuie of six thousand men. Monsieur de uie the Kings Ambassador, made it known in an open Assembly of all the Cantons, that the King had had more patience, then the iniurie done vnto his Crowne did permit, being vnwilling to take armes vntill that all Europe had iudged, that the Duke of Sauoy proceeded not sincerely, and that he vttered his Maiestie to repel by force the iniury of the detention of the Marquillat of Saluces, yet could he not keepe the petite Cantons from granting a leuie vnto the Duke, the which notwithstanding was by him made vnprofitable. Wee may not heere omit a particular accident. Among the cheefe gentlemen which la Guiche Gouvernor of Lions had drawne out of his government to serue the king in his armie of Sauoy, were Chazeul and du Bourg both well knowne for their valour and experience in armes. The King made good esteeme of them, and gaue a Commission to the last, to raise a regiment of a thousand men. Being gone to make this leuie, Enuie which doth alwaies oppose it selfe to the merits of Vertue, & which is ineuitable in the beginning of prosperitie, was greued that a gentleman, which had followed the League, should be chosen among so many others to serue the King in this war, and forged an imposture sufficient to ruine, if it had incountred a Prince as apt to choller as he is to Justice and Clemencie. They cast abroad tickets in the Kings chamber & withdrawing chamber, that these two gentlemen hauing failed an enterprise vpon his Maiesties person at the passage of the Ruer neer vnto Chamouisset, had referred the execution thereof to Monliers, & that his Maiestie should remeber that vpon the way to Chamouisset, one of them (his courage fainting) drew backe from the King to talke with a knight which marched on the one side. This was enough to kindle the Kings choller, & to make it passe like vnto a thunder-bolt, which D breakes and wounds before wee see the lightning or heare the cracke. But this Prince who all his life had followed the Precept, which the Emperor Basilus gaue vnto his son, not to giue eare to slanderous & enuious reports, found that this billet proceeded from a wicked and vnkind passion, for that he remembered well that to speake with du Bourg, he had caused Chazeul to change his place, where mention was made in biller. He shewed it to la Guiche gouernour of Lions, who presently conceyued that it was an imposture: He called Chazeul vnto him, more to confirme the good opinion he had of his Loyalty, then to shewe him that this more were able to giue him any signe of ieaiousie or distrust. And for that the bruite of this trecherie could not be kept secret, he caused a letter to be written to du Bourg, commanding him not to discontinue the leuie of his regiment, for any thing he should heare spoken against his loyaltie, whereof he would haue no other proofe but his courage, and the execution of that which he commanded him. Du Bourg being at Lions, and hearing there were things spoken of him which he neuer thought, he takes post and comes to the King as he rose from Dinner, being enuironed by all the chiefe Noble men of his Court. As Soone as he perceyued him he asked whie he was come. Sir answered du Bourg, it is said at Lions that Espinasse would kill you: Du Bourg brings you his Head. The King replied that he held him to honest a man to haue such a thought, and that such as had giuen this intelligence were wicked impostors. They did see that I ment to imploye you, as I will alwayes when any occasion is offered for my seruice. They could produce no other effects of their enuie but in writing of this billet, but they haue not found me so tractable and credulous as they thought. Princes Courts were neuer without them, but he hath fewest that doth least beleue them, I doe not as Kings my Predecessors, who kept in mind, while they liued what two or three had tould them. No man knowes my realme better then 1601. my selfe. I haue found three factions. That of the deceased King hath troubled me. A Of three I haue made one: there is no more any distinction. I am King of the one as well as of the other, and hold them all for my subiects. I make no difference among them for their affection to my seruice, but I know how to make chiose of them that are Capable of charges, & for your regard you shall neuer bee forgotten when any is offered.

Du Bourg hauing thanked the King for the confidence it pleased him to haue of his loyalty, seemed notwithstanding much afflicted for this slander. The King sayd vnto him, that hee had already told Chazent that 't pittied him to see him afflicted for a thing which he had neuer beleueed, & which he held incredible. he asked him if he suspected any one, assuring him that if he did name him, he wold of his absolute power put him to the Racke, & if any one should accuse the, he wold alwaies hold the accusation scand- B alous, being far from the thought of gentlemen of their force: and if he should beleue billers; there were no safety for good men in his Court. But the King adds (to increafe the hearts of these spightfull spirits) go and raise your Regiment, and beleue mee that if you bring speedily the number of men which you haue promised, you shall punish the more rigorously then Iustice wold, if they were known: for there is no such tormēt to an enemy as to do well. That which was sayd of these two was very false, but that which was sayd of two others was very true. The King had intelligence that two dispe-rate men, by one motion & diuers meanes had an enterprife vpon his person.

Two desperate men seet

King.

One aduise was accompanied with a Description and the Portraits of these wretches.
 One of them was knowne, and seene two or three times neere vnto the King. One to whom Villeroy had giuen a copy of the Portraits, to watch & obserue this villainy, see- C ing him one day neerer vnto the King then hee should bee, wished his Maiesty to take heed. He contented this aduise, saying that his life depended of God, and not of the practises of his enemies. Hee would not suffer them to apprehend him, saying Let him alone he is a wicked man. Such wills shall not go unpunished. God will punish this without my doing. The Castell of Montmelian was held one of the strongest places in Christendome, and those which haue seene the Portrait, with the order of the Kings Campe and the forme of his Battery, haue wondered that it did so sodenly yeeld. The King himselfe sayd it was impregnable. It is seate vpon the toppe of a Mountaine, the Ditches bee Precipices on euery side, the defences five great Bastions well flanked D
 : there is but one passage to it from the Towne, but so vn easie as it is not to bee wonne; being Ditcht, Retrencht and Flanked with aduantage: but there is no Fortresse that can bee termed stronge if it bee not assayed, and they measure the strength or weaknesse of a place more by the quality of him that doth besiege it then by her owne forces. The King (whose reputation assured a happy ende) resoluēd to besiege it, being informed of the Estate of the place, and confirmed in his resolution by l'Escliqueres, who sayd these wordes vnto him. That hee wold submit himselfe to paie the Charges of the Army if that Fort were not taken within one moneth.

The French Army marched to besiege the Castell of Montmelian, which the Lord of Créquy (commanding in the Towne since the taking thereof,) had blockt vp as well as hee could. His Maiesty being arriued, he summoned the Count of Brandis to yeeld, and to receiue his commandements, threatening him with the fury of fortie Cannons: the Earle answered, That hee would neuer yeeld the place but to his Soueraign: Lord the Duke of Sauoye, and if they did besiege him, Montmelian should bee the Captiuitie of the French. Some thinke that this intolent answere proceeded onely from feare. In the meane time the Marquise Rosny, great Master of the Artillery, lost no time to plant his Batteries, drawing vp seauen Cannons by the force of Mens hands to command the Castell, and to batter it at random: then in the same plaine, at the foote of the hill he caused two batteries to be made by de Bordes (Lieutenant generall of the artillery) as well against the Bastion of Maruosijs, as other places which they held easiest to bee battered, especially that which was before the Bastion Bouillars, the which might also Batter an olde Tower or Dongeon, being foure square, and almost ruined

A ruined, hauing beene battered in former time by the Army of King Francis the first. 1600 The two batteries on the other side of the Water played vpon the bast fort, and into the portall of the Dongeon at random, vpon those that should issue forth, or offer themselves to defend the breach, the which did more amaze the beleeged then any thing else, who being well furnished with artillery and other munition, spared not their shot, the which notwithstanding could not hinder the lodging of the Kings Artillery.
 Whilēt they planted the Cannon, the King went to viewe the passages of the Mountaines by the which the Duke of Sauoy might enter on this side. He was then at Thurin and did not bouge, seeming carelesse of the ruine of his Estates: yet some times some of his most trusty seruants would say. *The King of France takes Townes in Sauoy, but patience.
 His Highnes will take as many in France, and better:* these words being reported, made the King to suspect some bad desseigne, considering the aduertisement they had of three Murderers, whereof one was come expressly out of Piedmont to Murder the King:
 yet he feared not them but rather la Fin, who was very inward with the Marshall Biron, and that they would seeke to effect the desseigns which they had plotted at Paris, when as the Duke of Sauoy was there, whereof the King had had some intelligence, but hee could not beleuee it. His Maiesty who loued the Marshall Biron well, wished him to dimisse la Fin, that his company was dangerous, and in the end he would deceiue him.
 But the Marshall was no more capable of Councell: two great & violent passions, ambition & reuenge had so dispeered his iudgement, as he was no more himselfe, the which grew vpon occasions which fell out in this War of Sauoy. The first was despight and ialousie, to see all the authority of command, all the honor of enterprises, all the conduct of executions giuen to l'Escliqueres, for that he knew the Country & knew the enemies forces better then any other. Hee was discontented for that he was not at the siege of Montmelian, as hee had beene at the siege of Amiens. The other was the reuill which the King made vnto him, to dispose of the Cittadell of Bourg, when it should be taken, which refusal was grounded vpon great considerations. The first that it was not reasonable to trust a place of that importance to him that was suspected to haue intelligence with his enemy. The second, that Gouvernors of Prouinces which command in Chiefe, ought not to haue the gard of Places & Forteresses. The third was, that the King meēt to commit that place (as one of the Keies of his Realme towards Italie) to one that depended immediatly on his Maiesty. But we must ioyne this discourse to his processe & to the discouery of his conspiracies, the which he thought to be very secret, for that they were not knowne nor diuulged. All Italy being amazed to see the King at the foote of the Alpes, & the three fortresses which remained in Bresse & Sauoy so straightly beleeged, as they must needs fall into the power of the victorious French, sayd, That the Marquisate was the pretext, but Naples & Milan was the cause of the war. The Duke of Sessa the King of Spains Ambassador at Rome, represented vnto the Pope, the infinite ruines & detolarations which would follow by the continuance of this Warre, and the victorious successe which the Turke had vpon the frontiers of Austria, being ready to make a great breach vpon the Christians, whilēt the Princes which he feared most were at Warre, and the most warlike people of Europe killed one another. Hee therefore beleecheth him to send his Nephew vnto the King, to stay the course of his Armes, and to resume againe the execution of the treaty of Paris. The Pope (to whom the diuifion of Christian Princes hath alwaies bin displeasing, desiring more then any of his Predecessors to assure the publicke quiet) grāts this great & famous Ambassage of Cardinal Aldobridino his Nephew, who yong of age, but not of wisdom and iudgement, wold not depart out of Rome before the Duke of Sessa had giuen his word vnto the Pope, that hee wold cause the King of Spaine to approue, & the Duke to obserue whatsoeuer he should treat with this assurance he past to Milan, getting the like promise frō the Count of Fuente vnder his hand, being there ready with the King of Spains forces to succor the Duke of Sauoy: to whom he sayd. That hee made this voiage for the only respect of the King of Spaine, & if the Duke of Sauoy only had bin interested, he wold not haue absented himselfe so long from the Consistory, he was not therefore resoluēd to proceed any farther, Cardinal Aldobridino sent Legat to

King.

1600. if hee did not assure him to make the Duke obserue all that he desired, and to retire A his forces if he made any difficultie. The Count who sought but to see that which was on the other side of the Alpes, to serue as a rampier for Milan, promised him, that a passage might be referred for the Spaniards to goe into Flanders. It was a great wisdom in this young Cardinal not to treat of so important a business, but vpon good cautions. The Cardinal being thus assured, leaves his traine at Alexandria, & comes to Turin, leaving his intention to be, to finish his pilgrimage to our Ladie of Mont Penus, and to see a passing. The Duke enters into complaint of the losse of his Estates, and sweares to strike all means to haue his reuenge. The Legat seemes cold, he represents vnto him the necessitie of peace, and the good of Concord, and he lets him know that he should desire to keepe his friends which are the true Scepters of Princes. He adds more ouer B that hee was sorrie for the bad estate of his affaires, the which if hee might repaire, hee would willingly goe to Chambery. The Duke intreats him to take the paine, gives him a blanke, & assures him that he will neuer haue any will nor resolution to contradict that which he should conclude in this negotiation, with this promise and an assurance that he should not attempt any thing more then the succoring of Montmelian he passed the Alpes. And for that he feared that the King in his great aduantage, would not haik to a peace, and much lesse grant any truce, and that this inequality would make all reasons vnequall, he would not aduise the Duke to send his Ambassadors, vntill hee first knew the Kings minde. He therefore commands Hermio his Secretarie to aduertise him of his coming, and of the desire he had to serue his Maestie, not for the continuance of the C War, but for a confirmation of Peace. The King vpon this aduise stays at Annessy, to giue audience to Hermio, who was presented vnto him by the Patriarke, who said vnto him that the Legat his Master was sent by the Pope, to quench the fire of warre. The King excused himselfe, vpon the diaduantage hee should receiue, and the prejudice it would bring to his affaires, in retreating when he should aduance, and to contemne the commodities and occasions which were offered vnto him in this enterprife by the consideration of Time & Place. But he assured him that the Cardinall should be very welcome for the respect of his Holines, for the particular of his person, and for the subiect D of his Legation. although his enemies had giuen it out, that it was made in the Dukes fauour, that he did attribute al to Pietie, Wisedome, and a Fatherly care, in his Holines: who should alwaies find as much will in him to maintaine peace, as he had bene greened to come to armes, refusing neuer any treatie, so as it might be with honor and safetie, being resolute neuer to indure any iniurie from the Duke of Sauoy nor his adherents. Hermio made some other propositions, the answer wherof, the King referred to Chambery, whether the King appointed to come within foure or five daies. The King went from Annessy to Beaufort to view the passages of the mountaine, by the which the Duke might come, hee sent the Duke Biron to discover that of our Ladie of Gorge, and others altogether inaccessible, but onely for Beares, and Camels. The King went vp the mountaine, as far as the pace of Cornet, where he dined vnder a rocke, to defend himselfe from snow: after he had viewed the passage which may serue the enemy, hee parted from Beaufort, & took his lodging at Gilly neere to Corinsins, where he was informed of the true Estate of the beleeged, who had no hope but in themselves, being impossible for the Duke of Sauoy to succor them. But what doth the Duke whilst the King rules in his Countie, & that L'Escligueres spoyle all the vallies of Morieune and Tarentaise? He which had bin the Kings Agent with the Duke, hauing taken his leaue, came to his Maestie at Grenoble, telling him that the Duke talked of nothing but fighting, he answered that hee should find him readie to shew him sport. The Spaniards who would make him appeare their voyage of Paris, sayd that they might not breake the body of the troups, nor diuide their forces, appointed for the defence of Piedmont. The Duke would haue sent 3000. Spaniards to defend the valley of Tarentaise, but they would not march, not for feare, but by order of their Commander, which kept them backe. D'Albign had much adoe to make them stay at the Fort of little Saint Bernard, on that side of the valley of Aost, which if they had done, the Duke might haue accepted some thing in Freuence and Daulphiné to haue diuerted the Kings forces. But

A But it hath bin alwaies obserued that such as haue trusted to the succors of Spain, haue tried to their greefe that they desire rather to entertaine the D seale then to aduance the Cure. It is a Military Maxime among them to make one Boby of an army, but especially not to do any thing without direction, so as oftentimes great opportunities are lost in attending, for if the Councill be far off, they come alwaies after the effect. The King hauing provided for the passages returns to Montmelian, hee sent word to the Earle of Brandis, that if he would forbear to shoote that day, he would also cause his battery to cease. They told the King that the Earle granted it as willingly, as if hee had no resolution to refuse any thing to so great a Prince. The King was not ignorant of B the Estate of the beleeged, for besides that at the taking of the Towne, hee had taken Notes and Inuentories of the munition that was in the Castell, their alwaies escaped some one ouer the Wall which brought newes, and described the place in as miserable an Estate, as they could, as well to excuse their flight as to tell the truth. A Cannon shot from one of the Kings Batteries, perced the Wall within a foote of the Caue, whereas all their Powder and Munition of Warre did lie, the which had ended the Battery, if it had gon a little further. The Earle of Brandis seeing that nothing came from without that might entertaine hope, and iudging that nothing was lesse becoming a Captaine then rashnes, did not contemne the perswasions which necessity and the aduice of his friends gaue him to thinke of the soldiars health, seeing that of the place was desperate. The King summons him againe, not to be obstinate: they found him so C well disposed there vnto as presently they did iudge wherevnto things would tend. The Earle calls together the Captaines & gentlemen that were with him, to determine of some holdsome expedient, not to offend the seruice of their Prince, nor to incense the power of a great King, and to provide for the common health of them all, he presents vnto them the Estate and extremities, where vnto the place was reduced, and coniures them by the faith which they owe vnto his Highnesse, to tell him their opinions vpon their Consciences for the Election of two things. The one. To endure the attempts of the French forces, and die in loosing of the place, or els. To capitulate and take the longest time they could, to giue his Highnesse leisure to succor them. Their propositions did not incounter one and the same aduice, Some sayd. That seeing his Highnesse honored them with the gard of the onely Bulwarke of his Estates: they should rather all die therein then yeeld the place to the King of France, and that the apparent danger might be avoided by some favorable accident. Others of the contrary side maintayned. That accidents were doubtfull, & that it were better according to the time to take an assured and easie party. That euery one knewe that the most Christian King was wel informed of the Estate of that place. That they had suffered to the extremity. That they were battred with 40. Cannons: That they had receiued many disgraces and losse of men burnt by fire which had taken their Powder. That since two monethes they had receiued no newes from his Highnesse. That they wanted all kind of victuell but Corne, which with good but bandry could not last to the end of Nouember: That it were better to enter into composition & seeing the King offered it, and take a reasonable terme to yeeld vp the place, whilest that his Highnesse should giue order to succor them, or to treat of a Peace. The most resolute were shaken at these wordes, and in the end all concluded to make their Peace in time, wherevnto in the end they had bene forced. The Earle made an Act, the which was signed by all the Captaines and Officers of the Garrison, by the which he demanded a truce of the King for fixe daies, at the end wherof he did Capitulate to depart he & his company with Lienes and Goods, Enseignes displayed, Drums sounding, Boullers in the mouth, Harguebaze charged, their matches light, & furnished with what munition of Warre they could carry, without serch, if the Duke did not succor them within one month, the which was granted, & moreover they had leaue to send a Captaine to the Duke, to aduertise him thereof. The Cheualier Bricher had the charge to carry these newes vnto the Duke, the which he receiued with great discontent. The same day the Capitulation of Montmelian was made, the King sent the Secretary Hermio to go & meet the Cardinal Aldobrandino his Master, with charge to assure him of his Maesties willingnes

1600. willingnes to peace, and of the desire hee had to see him, to open his heart, and to present vnto him the Iustice of his armes, and to let him know that hee had not undertaken them to trouble Italy or Christendome, as his enemies had maliciously given out, after that they had forced him to protract his marriage, and to take the way of Sauoy, the which was not greatly pleasing vnto him in this season, intreating him to take in good part, if he did not answer to the particular propositions propounded vnto him by Hermio vntill his annuall, assuring himselfe that hee would come with sufficient power, to conclude a good accord, without any more trouble of doing it twice. But his Maiesie excused himselfe from any surceasing of armes. It being vnrasonable to lie idly in a enemies Countrey, whereas the entertainment of his army, cost him two hundred thousand Crownes a moneth, and that hee should attend the winter, and give the enemy leisure to prepare himselfe. The Duke held this treatie to bee sodaine and rash: some braue spirits about him imputed it to cowardlines, rather then to treason. He made answer by Bricherias and assured the beleeged to succor them: and presently after he sent another letter in these termes: Mons de Brandis, for the execution of that which I haue signified vnto you, by the Chenalier Bricherias, behold I am on Horse-backe ready to passe the Alpes with so mightie an army, as if you will giue me some little time, more then is specified in the Capitulation, you shall see the sport, and bind me, mine and all Sauoy, for euer to acknowledge you for the most faithful, the most profitable, and the worthiest Subiect in my Estates, you shall be noted throughout all Christendome, which now attends your resolution, and you shall free your selfe from the ignominie and reproch which you should incur by your Capitulation. Shew your selfe I pray you a knight worthe of the house from whence you are descended, and of the loue I haue borne you: regard herein your honour cheefly, and the consequence which shall grow by your resolution, it is but for a few dayes, if I come not by the tyme limited, and the Cardinall Aldobrandino who is gone thitherward, effects not what he doth expect, you must not respect your hostages, it is not likely they shall miserie, and if the worst happen, they cannot import so much as the losse of that place. Write vnto mee if it bee possible. In my hope from you, depends all that I am to doe with such goodly forces. If I were not assured to succour you speedily, I would not perswade you to breake the Capitulation. But this assurance makes mee say vnto you, that you ought not to doubt, for these reasons & infinite others which you should lay before you. The Duke had added in the end of his letter, these words with his owne hand. I thinke that Bricherias is already come vnto you shew me now the prooffe of so many promises which you haue made mee, and giue mee the tyme that I haue set downe, and you shall see the sport where you are. By this letter it seemed the Duke cared not much for the life of his hostages: The Duke of Espernon by the Kings commandement, acquainted the Earle of Brandis with this letter, who answered, you may say vnto his Maiesie, that I will keepe my word, in the assurance whereof I hold my life and honour. The King tooke a new assurance in writing, signed by him and the other Captaines which had signed the Capitulation. Five dayes after this confirmation, the Cardinall Aldobrandino past by Montmelian, the army standing in battayle, where he was saluted by the Kings artillerie, and that of the Castel. The Duke Espernon met him first vpon the bridge of Montmelian, and then all the Princes and Noblemen incountred him vpon the way, and accompanied him to Chambery, whereas the King receiued him with good honor, and in his first audience at the Capuchins, he said vnto him. That he doubted not of the Iustice of his armes, & of the advantage which his valour had gotten him ouer the Duke of Sauoy, but hee held him for a Prince so full of affect on, to the good and quiet of Christendome, as hee would neuer use the frute of his victory, to the ruine of the Peace, and publike tranquillitie, but would suffer the Popes earnest motion vnto him to desire peace, to be of more force then the perswasions of such as moued him to continue this warre, a warre which was neither worthe the greatnesse of his courage, nor the fruits of his armes, for it it were made to enlarge his Empire, the Estate of Sauoy is a small thing, and if it were for the reuenge of some wrong, he should consider that the reuenge which is not betwixt equall

The Duke's letter to the Earle of Brandis the 30. of Oct. 1600.

The Duke of Espernon promised to keep his word.

The Legats, the Duke and the King.

A equal parties, is alwaies vnjust, & hath no sparke of generosity in it. That War is vnconstant, and the ende is not alwaies answerable to the beginning, and there was no Prince that for the most assured opinions of Victory, was to bee commended in refusing the conditions of an Honorable Peace. A Peace which the Pope desired for the Good of all Christendome: for the consolation of those which trembled at the Turkes approaches: who feared that this diuision would ingage France in the forepassed miseries. A Peace which the Duke of Sauoy desired, and for the which hee promised to yeeld himselfe more tractable then euer hee had beene. A Peace which would bring forth meanes to succor the Christians affaires in Hungary, to roote the memory of the Turke out of the world, & free Europe from his fury. The King answered him. That hee had alwaies held it for a rule of Conscience to content himselfe with his owne, as well as not to suffer an vsurpation. But he could not hope for any reason from the Duke of Sauoy but by armes, the which he was forced to vse to reuenge the vsurpation of his Marquis, seeing neither the feeling of his own Conscience, nor the iudgement of his Holmes, nor the assurance of his promises made at Paris, could moue him to do that which he ought. That if his army did passe the Alpes, he should finde good Seruants in Piedmont, and that the soile was as Fertill as euer it was to plant the flower de Luce there, and make it flourish, but when he should haue gotten all that the Duke holds on this and the other side of the Mountaines, he would alwaies leane it in yeelding vp his Marquisate. The effect of this Ambassage was, that Hermio went to informe the Duke that the Cardinall his Master had disposed the King to a Peace, the Duke receiued these newes with ioye, and made choise of the Count d'Arconas and the Seigneur d'Almes for this negotiation, commanding them to doe all the Legat should command touching the Peace. The King notwithstanding, said that hee would not thinke of any Peace vntill that Montmelian were yeelded. And that his Councell was not neere him, the Constable and Chancellor being sent to Marseilles to receiue the Queene. And the Duke was not so much inclined to a Peace, but hee did his indeauor to succor Montmelian; The 12. of Nouember he came to the valley of Aost, with ten thousand foote, foure thousand Harguebuziers on horse-backe and 800. Men at Armes: hauing past the Mount lodged at Ema being himselfe in person. The King commanded the Count Soiffens to go to Mouliers, whereas L'Esdiuieres attended the enemy, and his Maiesie went from Chambery to Montmelian, to expect the yeelding vp of the place, the which was deliuered vp the sixteenth of Nouember according to the capitulation by the Count Brandis, with great store of Artillery, Bullets and Powder to shooe about 20000. Cannon shot; the Marquis Rhosny and Creguy (who was appointed Gouverneur by the King) entred into it with 500. men. His Maiesie hauing given order for Montmelian, departed the next day (without entring into the Castell) to visite his Army, the which finding as resolute as hee desired, hee had no other desaigne but to seeke all meanes to approach neere in viewe of his enemy, by diuers discoueries which he sent to make in diuers places: but all was so couered with deepe snowe, as it was impossible to doe any thing, but to greue at the discomfort and in the meane tyme to keepe the soldiers in breath, in attempting of some places, among others the Tower of Alate, and some Corps de garde placed at the entry of the next Mountaines, the which the Regiment of Nauarre did soone breake. The King being aduertised by his good intelligence, that the Duke (stayed by the like discomfort of the wether and place) must needs retire or at the least much inaccomodate his own Countrey, his subsidies and Army, hee left L'Esdiuieres at Mouliers with his troups, to command in the Countrey of Tarentaise, and to attempt as occasion should serue vntill the Duke were retired. His Maiesie came to Chambery, whereas the Cardinall Aldobrandino presented vnto him Arconas & d'Almes, the Dukes Deputies for the Peace, to whom he said. Your Master hath nothing but words and I shew the effect: I sayd vnto you at Paris (speaking to Almes) that you were welcome, so I say now, but I meane not to treat but with this Reuerend personage speaking of the Legat. The Duke presented to the King.

1600. the treatie of peace to the returne of his Chancellor and Councell from Marfellies and went with the rest of his army to assure Saint Katherins Fort, whether in the beginning he had sent the Lord of Saucy, to raise a regiment of foot in the Countie, to keepe in the garrison of the Fort, and afterwards Monsieur d'Uiry with the Regiments of the Cheualier of Montmorency, Cordes and other troupes. Saint Katherins Fort is built vpon an high hill, which ouerlooks all the Countie, it consists of five bastions which are not walled, yet it is ditcht and furnished with all things necessarie: It lies two Leagues from Genoa, defended by six hundred men, whereof two parts were Swisses. Some few dayes before the Kings arriuall, one of the Capitaines of the beleeged, went forth with his Maiesties leaue to the Duke of Nemours, who with the Kings good leaue was retired to his house of Anisy, that he might be freed from this warre, and not hurt or preiudice his Cousin the Duke of Saucy, the King sent presently one of his gards to bring him to Zelusel where hee was lodged, a quarter of a League from the Fort: hauing let him vnderstand the resolution of his dessein, the greateste of his forces, & the small hope they should haue of the Duke: hee preuailed so as soon after his returne to his Companions they did capitulate to depart with their baggage and armes, their Drummes sounding, and Enseignes displayed, carrying away with them a third part of the artillerie, if they were not succoured within tenne dayes. The King left the Count Saissions to attend the effect of this capitulation, and went to Lions to meet the Queene, as wee shall shew hereafter.

The Duke of Saucy hauing failed at Montmelian, gaue it out that he would succor Saint Katherins Fort. He had a goodly army, and those that were about him thought there were but too many to chate the French out of Saucy. Moreouer hee thought to haue a passage by Valais, either willingly or by force: he had also good friends among the pettie Cantons of the Swisses, being distastd with the seruice of this Crowne, for that they were not payed what was due vnto the DePte the Kings Ambassader made all their friendship fruitles, employing himselfe worthily against all his practises: hee assisted in all their assemblies, hauing good words to content some, and patience to digest the indirection of others, and couragious answeres against the threats and braueries of the most difficult, yet he could not hinder the Leue of 4000. men, granted to the King of Spain, by foure or five Cantons for the defence of Milan, with charge not to enter vpon the Kings Dominions, vpon paine of death: but hee kept them from marching so soone as the enemy desired, which stay made them not onely vnprofitable, but also hurtful, by his great expences. The six dayes being expired, the Gouernour of S. Katherins Fort came forth with 600. men, according to the Capitulation. All the Capitaines of the Duke of Saucys places excused their yeelding vpon necessity, to accuse then Prince of indiscretion, who had reason to complaine of their valours, for they might haue done better. The Count Saissions aduertised, after the yeelding of Saint Katherins Fort, that the Duke coming by the Tarentaise, aduanced with his whole army, to succour the beleeged, hee assembled his troupes, and resolved to meet and fight with him if hee durst hazard the day. But hee was sooner aduertised of his retreat then of his marching. The Duke had sayd at Paris, and to the Seignior of Fossause at Turin, that whoeuer would make warre against him, he would shew himselfe for fortie yeares space, but hee lost all Saucy in lesse then fortie dayes, and there remained nothing in Bresse but the Cittadell of Eoung, without all hope to be succored by force. He entertained Bouuens who commanded there, with hope that he should receive a great Conuoie from Bourgogne, which the Baron of Lux and of S. Angelo, who beleeged it with Blockhowfes, hindred Captaine Vatulier to effect. And then hee exhorted them by letters to hold it good vntill the treatie of peace, whereof he assured them: the which was the onely meanes (as wee shall shew) to free the beleeged from the necessitie whereunto they were reduced, and without the which they must needs haue fallen vnder his Maiesties subiection. Behold all which passed of great import in the conquest of Saucy, and Bresse by the most Christian King. But this warre did not hinder him from thinking of his marriage, he had beene contracted at Florence the 25.

A of August, Monsieur de Belle-garde Maister of the Kings Horse carried the procuration to the great Duke of Tuscany. The Duke of Mantua came to Florence the 2. of October, and the next day arriued the Ambassador of Venice. The Pope would gladly haue had the Queene receiue this blessing of her Marriage at his hands, and to haue done her the like honor as he did to the Queene of Spain at Ferrara, the which for certaine reasons could not be effected, and therefore he sent the Cardinall Alabrando his Holines Legat & Nephew, in whose hands the words of preser Marriage were made.

The 4. of October the Cardinall entred into Florence with great pompe, riding vnder a Canopy and the Duke on his left hand, and so was conducted to the Dukes Pallace. After Supper in the presence of the Great Duke of Tuscany, the Dukes of Mantua and Bracciano, the Princes Iohn and Anthony of Medicis, and the Lord of Belle-garde the Kings Ambassador. He deliuered vnto the Queene the contentment which the Pope had of this Marriage, with a sweet kinde of Gravity and Modesty: & a discourse full of pleasing words: he conceiued great hopes of great good to come, by the meanes of this happy coniunction, not only for the houses of the Kings of France & the Dukes of Tuscany, but also for all Christendome; and not onely for Christian Kingdome, but for all the World: So as the Queene moued with ioy & great hope, thanked his Holines for this Salutation, & said: That God hauing so decreed it, shee assured her selfe, that the blessing of the Holy Father would bring the grace of God with it, whereof she would indeuour to make her selfe worthy & capable, recommending her selfe most humble to the prayers of his Holines and of the Church. Which words were deliuered alter to Maiechall a manner, as if this Princeesse had vsed alwayes to command absolutely: and so that day was spent. The 5. of October the Marriage was celebrated after a Royall manner, the Legat sayde Masse, the which being ended the Great Duke had a Son Christned, the Seigneury of Venice giuing it the name. The Queene parted from Florence the 16. of October, and came to Liurne the 17. where she imbarked in the Great Dukes generall Galley, being assisted by five of the Popes Gallies, five of Malta, and sixe more of the said Dukes. The King hauing intelligence of her imbarking, provided for her reception at Marfeilles, and gaue the charge of his Will to the Duke of Guise, his Maiesties Lieutenant Generall in Prouence: he also sent his Constable & Chancellor with the Dukes of Nemours, Guise and Ventador to receiue her. The Cardinalls of Touze, Gondy, Guiry and Sourdy, with many Bishops and Noblemen of the Councell. The Nauigation was dangerous in many places, yet with a resolute and cheerefull countenance she seemed to scorne the Tempests of the Sea. The 3. of Nouember she tooke Port at Marfeilles, being accompanied by the great Duchesse of Florence, the Duchesse of Mantua her Sister, D. Anthony her Brother, and the Duke of Bracciano.

The Queene leaving her Gally, entred vpon a Theater made of two great Boates, wherinto ioynd a Bridge, which went vnto her Pallace. The Constable receiued her; the Chancellor deliuered the Kings pleasure, 4. Consuls of Marfeilles presented her the Keyes of the Citty, & a Canopie of cloth of siluer, vnder which she was conducted to the Pallace. One of the most remarkable actions during her abroad there, was the protestation of obedience, which was made vnto her by the Court Parliament of Prouence, in the great Hall of the Pallace, Monsieur de Pair making a most eloquent Oration, as you may read at large in the Originall. The 17. of Nouember the Queene came to Aix, from whence she parted the next day, with about 2000. horse, to make her entry the 19. into Auignon, where she was receiued with greater Pompe & Magnificence then in any other place. Parting from Auignon, the Queene past to Valence, Roussillon & Vienne, & came on the Satterday to Guillottiere. The next day being the 3. of Decēber being met by the Gouernor, & all the Nobility of the Town & country, she entred in to Lions in great State, & so was conducted to her lodging, where she had newes from the King by Royuelaure, who preseted vnto her in his Maiesties name the great royal Col-ler, of inestimable value, which did beautify her other Ornāmets. She staid 8. daies at Lions before she could see the King, demāding euer when he wold come, & in this expectation the houres seemed years vnto her. The King after the capitulation of *S. 1600. that he should come that day. Being at supper a Gentleman came to tell her, that the King was within a quarter of a league of the City, and that within lesse then an houre he should see him. The ioy of this good newes had taken away her appetite to any meate. The King was already entred disguised, and was gotten into the presse among certain Gentlemen, where hee might see and not bee seene. After supper shee retired into her Chamber, and the King entred presently after, the Queene called her selfe at his Maiesties seere, and hee tooke her vp and imbraced her, where after many kinde imbracings of mutuall loue and respect, the King went to supper. During the which, the King sent the Queene word by the Duchesse of Nemours, that he was come without a Bed, hoping that she would afford him part of hers, which should be common vnto them from that time: To whom the Queene answered, that she was come to please and obey his Maiesties will, as his most humble seruant. This being deliuered vnto the King, hee enclothed himselfe & entred into the Queenes Chamber, whom he found in bed, and then the Ladies retired. The Cardinal Aldobrandino the Popes Legate being at Chambery, the King sent to inuite him to his Marriage, & to come to Lions with the Duke of Sauoy Deputies, where they should Treat more commodiously then at Chambery. He made his entry the 16. of the month, where he was receiued with honours fit for so great a dignity: the Prince Conty and the Duke Montpensier conducted him, going vnder a Canopy carried by the Burgeses of the Towne, the streets were hang'd, the Inhabitants were in Armes, & the Clergy went singing before him: and in this sort he was conducted to S. Johns Church. And although the Marriage were perfect, the King hauing ratified it by Procuracion, and by words of the present which the said Legate had receiued, so as there needed no other solemnity, yet would he make his Subjects partakers of this publike ioy, appointing the Ceremony the Sunday following, the which was Celebrated before the Great Alter of S. Johns Church, whereas the Nuptiall blessing was giuen by the Legate to the married couple. After the which a Largeesse of peeces of Gold and Siluer, marked with a speciall deuice were cast vnto the people. All which performed, they went to the Royall Feast in the Archbishops Great Hall.

The Turkes this yeare sent twelue thousand Tanissaries from Constantinople to Buda, to annoy the Christians with the neighbour Garrisons, so as they tooke Buboltz, a strong Towne and well manned with 500 Souldiars, and furnished with all kind of Munition, yet they grew amazed, and by their base cowardlinesse yeelded the Towne at the first Attempt, and were conducted to Pappa the 4. of September. The eight of the month, they beseege Canisfa, make their Approaches, and plant their Batteries. The Christians fall forth one morning, beat them out of their Trenches, and cloy their Canon, carrying one peece into the Towne. In the meane time, the Duke Mercure Lieutenant Generall for the Emperour in Hungary, comes to the River of Mour, the first of October, and hauing past it the same day, he gaue a signe to the beseeged of his arrival. The Turkes Vezir, hauing notice of the final number of Christians, sent the Duke word, that he should not oppose himselfe with such small troupes against his great Army, and that he should not thinke so strong a seege as he held before Canisfa, could be raised with such weake forces. The Duke Mercure answered him very courageously and Christ only, That he doubted not with fewe Christians to incounter a great number of Infidels, no though they were Devils, trusting in the helpe of God. And as the Christians advanced towards Canisfa, the Vezir drew 20000 men out of his Army, and seized vpon a hill in their passage, where he resolved to attend them, being but fiftene thousand Christians. French Germanes and Hungarians, all resolute to make no other lodging that day but in Canisfa, or to die in battaile. The Duke Mercure sent to discover them by Colonies, and in the meane time the Christian Army being in battell, with twelue Canons in front, marched against the Turkes, who came furiously to charge them, the Artillery receiues them in such sort as it dants their courages, and diminisheth their numbers, so as the Turkes are forced to retire with the losse of 14. field peeces. That night the Duke Mercure intrenched his Campe carefully, so as the Vezir seeing

A seeing that he should gaine little of him by force, he made a shew to turne backe & so come behind to enuiron the Christians with his whole armye, which hee put in battell like vnto a halfe Moone, and so he camped fise daies together, so as the Christians were driuen to great extremity: for the Contoy of victuals had bin taken by the Turkes & no more could be brought vnto the, the Souldiers being forced to eate Horle-flesh & drinke Water. The German Colonells & Captaines beseech the Duke to resolute vpon his retreat, and he coniures them to patience, to the which nothing is impossible: but the belly hath no eares: all are ready to mutine, or to retire: the Duke to auoide the blame of this shamefull resolution, would not consent, before that all the Colonels and Captaines had signed this aduice, whereupon he disposed of his retreat. The day of their rising, God gaue them a visible testimony of his protection, they were covered with such a thick Mist, as the Turkes could not discouer when they left their trenches, yet the followed after, and put some of the Recreward to the sword. The beseege apprehending this Retreat, were terrified: The Hungarians began first, and then the Germanes talked of yeelding, so as Canisfa which was the strongest place the Christians held in Stiria, was yeelded vnto the Turkes power, and vnder their Tyranny; to the great grieve of the Duke Mercure, seeing the preiudice which fell vnto Christendom, and this was the two and twentieth of October. The beseege were safely conducted to the riuer of Mours. The Gouvernor named Paradis, being presented to the Duke Mercure, hee sent him to Mathias the Archduke, who by the Emperors commandment (exacting an accompt of his charge, and not able to purge himselfe) was condemned for his cowardlinesse to haue his right Hand cut off, for that it had signed the Capitulation, and then his Head; the which was executed. In the meane time the Vezir makes twelue Forts vpon the Riuer of Drane, hauing lodged within Canisfa and in the sayd Forts three thousand foote, and fise hundred horse: causing a Proclamation to be made; That all Fugitiues might returne freely into Canisfa, promising them exemption of Tributes for three yeares together, the which was a dangerous bayte. In the beginning of this yeare, Charles Duke of Suederman, had entered into Liuonia and taken the strongest places, and was likely in a short time to expell the Polonians, if the Palatin Cogwitz had not made head against him with an Army of Polonians, neere vnto Coquehouse, where the Suedens were defeated in battell. Charles to be reuenged for this losse, gathers together his Troupes, and hauing a supply of twenty thousand Suedens, he charged the Polonians so furiously neere vnto Venda, as he tooke Cogwitz and defeated his Army: from thence he went to beseege Rigue, the Capitall Towne of all Liuonia.

The newes of this defeate being come into Poland, John Xamosci great Chancellor of Poland, hauing before resolved to go against Duke Charles, with the consent of the King of Poland and all the Polatins, hee aduanceth and sends Letters of Defiance to Duke Charles, deuouncing War against him. Hauing receiued this Challenge, he goes to Armes, and knowing that the Polonians lay betwixt certain Marishes and the Riuer of Vanda, he passed in the night with 9000. choise men, and surprising the Polonians halfe a sleepe, he chargeth and defeats them; spoyle and burnes their Campe, so as this mighty Army of forty thousand men, most part Horse, was by this meanes, and the want of Forrage, lying in marish grounds, without doing any good, in a short time consumed without fruit. Charles also on his part despayring of the seege of Rigue, went by Sea into Suedland, with John of Nassau, and Renauld of Solme, both Earles, where he had like to haue bene cast away by reason of the yce, the which did exceed, through the sharpnesse of the Winter.

We haue said, that in the end of the last yeare, the Cardinall Aldobrandino Legate to his Holines, made his entry into Lions to treat a Peace betwixt the King and the Duke of Sauoy. Presently after the Ceremony & Confirmation of the Nuptial blessing of their Maiesties, they began the Treaty of this Peace: the proposition had bin made at Chambery, but the conclusion was referred and ended at Lions. The King had made choise among al his Councel of the President Sillery & Tanin, to deliuer his intentions vnto the Legate, who acquainted Arconas & Alymes therewith. First the Dukes Deputies

betwixt the

of Sauoy.

1601. The Dukes Deputies demand Peace of the King, in yeelding up unto him the Marquisate of Salusse. A
The King answered, That he loved Warre, but he had neuer refused Peace to them that had demanded it: That seeing the Duke desired Peace, and his Holines perswaded him to it, for the quiet of Christendome, that he was content to grant it, so as the Duke did yeeld him his Marquisate, and to pay him eight hundred thousand Crownes which hee had disbursed for the Warres of Sauoy. The Legate found well by this demand that the Peace was not easie to be made as he expected: he spake vnto the King and told him; That the Duke could not yeeld the Marquisate, and so great a summe of Money but hee would giue him all Breffe in Exchange: and for all the charges and other his Maiesties pretensions, hee would giue him moreouer Baugcy, Verromey and other landes vnto the River of Rhosne. This Proposition was accepted by the Kings Deputies, so as they yeelded vp the Castles of Centall, Mont and Roque palmier, which did not belong to the Marquisate, but to the Prouinces of Dauphiné, and Prouence. The Deputies said, that what they offered was for all pretensions: to whom they answered; That nothing could then be concluded.

Propositions for the Peace.

S. Katherins Fort ruin. d. by the Geneva.

These things were so wisely handled by the Kings Deputies, as the Dukes Deputies offered besides a part of the Baylyweeke of Gex, a hundred thousand Crownes, so as the King did yeeld vp what he held in Sauoy, especially the Castle of Montmelian and S. Katherins Fort, in the same estate they were. As they were vpon these termes, newes comes, that they of Geneva had ruined S. Katherins Fort, and that with such animosity & diligence, as within two dayes after you could scarce discern the forme of it, for this Fort was built but of Earth. The Legate was wonderfully discontented thereat, and complayned saying, That he would returne to Rome, without doing anything, seeing they kept not their word with him, that he reuoked his repuing this demolition as an affront done vnto him. The Kings Deputies answered him, That the King had no neede of a Peace with the Duke, but for that his Holinesse perswaded him thereunto: that it was a small cause to breake the Treaty of Peace, seeing it was but a peece of Earth, that the foundation should remaine vnto the Duke, the which he might repaire when hee pleased. The King tooke the Legats words for a renewing of the Warre, and gaue leaue to his Army, to doe all acts of Hostility, charging the Commanders to stand vpon their Gard, to defend and offend, as occasions and meanes should be presented. Whereupon all dispaying of Peace, made new Enterprises; iudging, that the King would not rest hauing so great aduantages, they talked of nothing but of scouring of Armes, preparing of Hories, seeking of Money, and to make them ready for a new War.

The Kings answer to the Ambassadors of Spaine.

Taxis the King of Spaines Ambassador came vnto the King, to let him vnderstand; That if a Peace were not concluded, his Maister should bee forced to enter into this Warre, to preferue his Nephewes Estate. To whom the King answered, That he would liue in Peace, with them that loued Peace: but whosoever should seeke to support the Duke in this vnjust Warre, he would make them repent it. That he would make War like a Lion agaynst them that played the Foxes with him, & would strike them, that should make but shew to threaten him.

The Dukes Deputies (thinking that the Kings victory was neither absolute nor perfect, so long as Bourg held good) did still temporise, not caring to presse the conclusion of this Peace, no further then the extremity of this place did presse them, and in the meane time the Duke should haue leasure to attempt some thing vpon his own or vpon that which was the Kings. And in truth if Bourg had beene releued, or the Conuoy which was in the Franche County had entred, the Peace had bin broken. Besides the wants and impatience of the besieged, they without vsed a policy which made them almost desperate: some men choisen for the purpose gaue them to vnderstand, that the Dukes Deputies did prolong things, vpon assurance that the Cittadell might hold good a month, and that they cared not to finish the Treaty, nor to supply the necessities of the besieged, so as this temporising at what price & perill soeuer, might giue the Duke time to do his businesse. This did peece so deeply and wrought such an impression in the besieged, as (despight with the tediousnes of the Treaty, & wearied with the languishing of the besieged) they resolved not to suffer any more, seeing the Deputies did not consider what they suffered, but how much and how long they

A they might suffer. Vpon this vaine terror they write vnto the Deputies in these termes. 1601. My Lords, your protractions and delays kill vs, the temporising of your Treaty, is preiudiciall to the Honour of our Master, and the helth of his Seruants that are in this place: make hast then to finish the peace, for wee cannot hold about two daies: it is the perfixed time of our resistance. Beleeue the bearer, who will acquaint you with the rest of our extreme necessity. Attend no other letters from vs, fare ye wel &c. Yet they were not so ill as they sayd, but in matter of seege, all tayles when as they want patience. This letter with the fearefull report of the horrors and inhumanities which extreame famine caused in the Cittadell of Bourg, awaked the Ambassadors from the slumber, which the ruining of Saint Katherins Fort had held them in.

The Treaty renewed.

B Vpon these newes they goe vnto the Cardinall, they beseech him, that the ruine of one place (whose foundation remayned to the Duke) might not hinder the perfecting of this great building of Peace, the which notwithstanding could not bee but necessary, and profitable. The Cardinall who knewe that the Duke was much discontented with this demolition, & that the Count Fuentes Armie was much increased, and their mindes more inclyned to Warre then Peace, and yet beeing loath to repasse the Alpes, without the Glorie to haue quenched this fire, hee sayd vnto the Ambassadors that hee could not re-enter into the Treaty of Peace, if they did not giue it him in writing vnder their handes, that it was their aduice, and that they intreated him to do it as profitable for the Duke & necessary for his Estate. The Ambassadors being to much amazed with the newes of the extreme wants of the Cittadell of Bourg, fearing it would bee lost before the Peace was concluded, the which would impair the bargain, they willingly past this promise.

The Cardinall was still in choller that the demolition of Saint Katherins fort, should send him backe to Rome, and not carry the Pope that contentment of his Legation which hee expected. The King would gladly, the Pope should haue remayned, satisfied with the sincerity of his actions, but neither his Honour nor his humor would suffer him to intreate. Hee therefore thinkes it dishonorable to perswade him to Peace that hath more neede of it then himselfe. Hee is therefore resolved to Warre, and seeing that the Legate continued still in his complaintes, hee commanded the Marquis of Rhosny to goe to Paris to take order for the Munitions of War. Beeing ready to take Horse for the execution of the Kings commandment, hee goes to take his leaue of the Legat, and toucheth some things of the cause of his voyage, saying, That it was the Kings resolution to make Warre, seeing they could not hold themselves to a Peace. That for his part hee was sorry, that so great a personage as himselfe should take the paines to passe the Mountaines and bring them so neere vnto the Temple of Peace and not to enter into it: the Legat answered, That he was much grieved that his Legation and the paine hee had taken prooued fruitlesse: that hee knewe well the King in shewe desired Peace, but in effect Warre was his delight. Rhosny replied, that if Peace were good before the demolition of the Fort, it was nowe also good, that this accident did nothing import, seeing the ground was the Dukes, to do with all what hee pleased, and that for fifty thousand Crownes hee might build another Fort. The Dukes Ambassadors gaue the same reasons, coniuring him not to abandon the Shipp in this tempest, seeing hee had taken the Helme in hand in a calme season. Here vpon the Legat asked Rhosny if hee thought the King would bee pleased to recompence this demolition with money. Rhosny answered him, that hee knewe nothing, but beeing a thing reasonable, and the King a Prince of reason, hee presumed that if hee should promise it in his Maiesties name, hee would not fayle of his promise. The Legat intreated him to acquaint him with it, saying that hee was sorry hee had delt no sooner in the busines. Rhosny tells the King thereof, and returns his 1601. The Legat who would not haue his word giuen vnto the King to remaine vnpromisable, nor send backe the Kings Deputies, or referre the Assemblie to an other time, treats them not to make any shew of this charge, but to signe. They answer him that their hands and tongues were bound. The Legate dorth presse them, and they intreat him to giue them leaue to conferre with Taxis the Spanish Ambassadors, to the end that their doings might be countenanced by his Councell. They repare vnto the Oracle, they consult of two letters, the first of the eight of January, which commanded them to signe the peace, the second of the eleuenth which did forbid them. Taxis (who vnderstood the intents of the Councell of Spaine, who knowes that a peace is desired, so as the Marquisate might continue on the other side of the Alpes, and that there might bee a passage on this side to goe into Flanders, who weighed the conditions of peace, not by the difficulties of reasons, but by the prosperitie of euents, not by the peeces, but by the whole, wherein he finds what his Master desired) answereth them. That seeing his Highnes hath commanded you to signe the peace foure dayes since, I see nothing happened since, that may be sufficient or available to reuoke this commandement, nor the word which hee had giuen you to effect it. It is true that I thinke by this last letter, you are bound to stay the time which hee demands to attend with the Count Fuentes.

Hereupon arriued the Patriarke of Constantinople, great in perswasions, found in Reasons, profound in Councell, and subtil in Inuentions. Hee sheweth them the importance of this breach, the wrong done vnto the King, and the Legats wordingaged, C That the Duke writing this letter had not considered that the first was effected, that the estate of the busines allowed no counteraund, that that which was yesterday voluntarie, is this day fastened with nayles of Diamonds to an ineuitable necessity. The Dukes Ambassadors who feared more to erre by disobedience, then by obstinacie, stand firme vpon the necessitie of the Dukes command, for the order which a Prince prescribeth to his Ambassador may not be altered. The Patriarke assures them that the Legat, who had authoritie from their master to command them, and they bound to obey him in all that hee should iudge profitable for his affaires, should warrant them vnder his hand from all blame, which they apprehended, desiring him that he would take the paines to go vnto his Highnesse to Thurin, to let him vnderstand that D they had done nothing but what hee should haue done himselfe, and that he would imploy all the power his vnckle had, both in heauen, and in earth, to free them from danger. The Ambassadors (who seemed not to will that which they most desired, with such impatience, as the houres seemed yeares vnto them) were content with this assurance signed by the Legat, & a monethes respite for the Duke to ratifie what they had signed. So the Peace was concluded and proclaymed at Lions the 17. of Ianuarie,

The substance

King, and the Duke of Sauiy

1601. the substance whereof was. That the Duke should yeeld vp and transpose wholly vnto the King, and to his successors Kings of France, all the Countrie and Seigneuries, of Bresse, Biengy and Verromey, and generally all that belongs vnto him, vnto the river of Rhofne, so as all the river from Geneua should belong to the Crowne of France, the E which should remaine vnto the King and his successors with all the Soueraignie, iurisdiction and rights which the sayd Duke might haue ouer the sayd Countries, reseruing nothing but the bridge of Gressin for the commoditie of the passage: the which is vpon the river of Rosne, betwixt Esluse and the bridge of Arley, which by this present Treatie belongs vnto the King: and on the other side of the river of Rosne, the Duke should enioy the parishes of Ella, Luyuent, and Cizerre with all the Hamlets and Territories which belong vnto them, betwixt the river of Varenne and the mountaine called the Grand Credo, vnto the village called La Riniere, whereas the river of Varenne doth passe, with Maigrecombe, vnto the neereft entrie into the Countie of Bourgogne, vpon condition that the Duke should not leuie any impositions vpon the goods F and inarchandise, nor any tolle vpon the river at Pont de Gressin, or any other places before mentioned. Moreouer the Duke might not build any Fort vpon any place that were reserued for the passage, but should remaine free as well for the Kings subiects, as for all that would go or come into France, and the souldiars which shal passe through

A through the Kings Country, for the Dukes seruice, or any other Prince, by the suffrance 1601 of his Gouvernours and Lieutenants generall, shall no way annoy his Maiesties subiects. And for the effecting of that aboue mentioned, the Duke should deliuer vnto the King, (or to any one deputed by him) the Cittadell of Bourg, as it then was, without any Demolition, and all the Artillerie, Poulder, Bullets, and munition of War, which that be in the place at the yeelding thereof. Moreouer the Duke did passe ouer vnto the King, on the other side of the river of Rhofne, the places and villages of Aux, Chouilly, Valley, Pont D'Arley, Cesset, Channey and Pierre Chassel with all the Soueraignie and Iurisdiction hee might haue ouer those places, and the Inhabitants thereof. The said Duke did also transport and resigne vnto the King, the Baronie and Baylewieke of Cetz, with all the B appurtenances, as the Duke and his Predecessors had formerly enioyed it, without any retention. All which places and things yeelded and resigned, should remaine vnted and incorporated to the Crowne of France, and should bee reputed the patrimonie of the Crowne, and might not bee seperated for any cause whatsoever. Also it was agreed that the sayd Duke should truly and effectually restore vnto the King, or to any one deputed by his Maiestie, the Place, Towne, and Chastellenie of Castell Dauphin, with the Tower of Pont, and all that hath bene held by the Duke, or any of his, depending of Dauphiné, in the same Estate they then were in, without any demolition or ruine, leaving in the sayd places, all the Artillerie, Poulder, Bullets, and munition of War which were then in the sayd places, the souldiars carrying away such goods as belonged vnto them, without exacting any thing of the Inhabitants. It was also agreed that C the sayd Duke should demantell the Fort of Beche Dauphin, the which was built during warre, and should pay for the passage reserued, a hundred thousand Crownes in the Cittie of Lions, fittie thousand readie downe, when as the Fort of Charbonnières should be yeelded vp, and other fittie thousand within six moneths after.

And in regard of the sayd grant and resignation, the King should be contented (for the good of the peace) to quitt and resigne vnto the Duke, his heires successors, all the rights and pretensions which hee or the Dauphins of France had, or might haue to the Marquisate of Saluces, and all the dependances, with the Townes of Cental, Monis, and Roque speruier, without retayning any thing: leaving vnto the Duke all the Artillerie, Poulder, Bullets and munition for Warre, which were in the sayd places, D in the yeare one thousand five hundred ninetie and eight. The King did also promise to restore vnto the Duke (or to any one that should bee deputed by him) all places that had bene taken since the yeare one thousand five hundred eightie and eight, from the said Duke, and now held by his Maiestie or his seruants, all in the same Estate they then were, and without any demolition, and in restoring of the sayd places, the King might transport all the Artillerie, Poulder, Bullets, and munition of Warre that was in them, and all the goods that belonged vnto the souldiars, not exacting any thing of the Inhabitants. These were the cheefe points of the treatie of Peace, the which was signed by the Legat and the Deputies, and thankes giuen vnto God. The E King holding his aboad at Lions, (after this conclusion) to be vnprofitable, takes Post and goes to Paris. The Legat goes to Auignon by the river of Rhofne. The King left the Constable, Villeroy and the Deputies at Lions for performance of the Treatie. At the same time Herminio was dispaht to carrie newes vnto the Pope, and in passing to the Duke of Sauiy, and the Count Fuentes, he found them both at Some vpon Poto consult of the meanes which the Duke of hiron propounded vnto them, to resolute vpon war rather then peace. The Duke receiues it as the most vnfürmable effect of all his adventures, swearing that he would cut of his Ambassadors heads that had signed it. The Count Fuentes sayd that hee had not to doe with this Peace, having so many iust occasions and such good meanes to make war, that he would not let 40000. men, and 40. F peeces of Cannon remaine idle. Both seemed discontented, the one for that the King, or the King of Spaine had all the benefit of the peace, and the other for that his master should haue need of him by the war, and he should keepe Piedmont in awe. The Duke complayned that the Councell of Spaine had kindled a war to consume him, they had

1601. thrust him into a storme, to make profite of his shipwracke, and had drawne him to a preiudiciall exchange, reaping no benefit, for that the French were out of Italy, hauing them neerer neighbours in another place, nor that Milan should bee covered, or that Italie should haue the Alpes to guard it from the inundations which it had receiued in former times by the forces of France, seeing this rampart was made with the weakening of his estates. The Count of Fuentes foreseeing whereunto these complaints did tend, gaue the Duke to vnderstand, That the King of Spain his master, had reason to complaine of this great and fruitlesse charge, being a troublesome thing to entertaine great forces to no effect: that this mightie and fearefull armie was not rayled nor entertained, but to restore him to his estate. that the fault was in himselfe, if it were not employed: and withall, he added the mutinies and murmuring of the Spaniards, who complained, that they deprived them of the fruits of a victorie which they did limit, with the taking of Lions. In this contention they resolute, not to signe any thing without the King of Spaines commaundement, and to keepe the armie still readie to march. The Kings Deputies being aduertised, that the Duke made no care to confirme what had bene concluded, they aduertised the King thereof, and sent a post vnto the Legat, being at Auignon, to know his opinion thereof. The King commaunds them to attend the Dukes resolution, without impatience, being indifferent vnto him which he made choise of, but he should shew a weake iudgement, if he should accept of any but of peace: for that hee should not of a long time recouer that by warre, which peace should now presently bring him. The Legat was so moued with this Alarm, as hee presently tooke post to goe vnto the Duke, sending Count Offauio Tazzoni to the King, to aduertise him of his voyage; and to beseech him not to enter into any distrust of the Treatie, being so greatly interested in the obseruation thereof, as hee could no longer endure this brute and suspence with patience: & that he would be pleased to grant a prolongation of the truce and a suspension of armes for fifteene dayes, besides the time limited for the ratification. Such as knew not the negotiation betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count Fuentes, & the Marshal Biron, could not beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would make any difficulty to signe the Treaty, but that he made some shew of it to haue it seeme the better. For those that were interested with him in the treatie, did not promise to returne any more vnto the warre. It is true, that if the Duke of Biron would haue taken the Cittadell of Bourg, as the Duke would haue delivered it vnto him, the King must haue returned with as great speed to Lions as hee departed. In the meantime the Legat past all passages by post in a troublesome time, & came to Genoa, from whence hee sent to the Duke, and Count Fuentes to keepe their word with him. The Duke hearing of his arriuall at Alexandria, parts from Nice, and goes to Thurin, and both of them excuse themselves. The Count made his refusall, to take from the Duke all subiect of complaint, that they had abandoned him, and that he had meanes to recouer his Estates, if they had assisted him. The Duke would be recompenced for this vnequall exchange before hee signed, for the King of Spain. So the Legat receiues nothing from the one but complaints, and from the other but respects, and from both words of contempt against the Treatie. Hee met with the Count Fuentes at Tortona, & from thence went to Milan, where he past the Shrouetide: The Count Fuentes omitting no kind of recreation to driue away melancholie, attending the Duke of Sauoyes resolution, who sent to excuse himselfe by the indisposition of his children, and promised to come to Milan, but comming not, the Legat and the Earle went to Paria, with an opinion that the Duke would come thither. The Legat sends Tazzoni vnto him, who returnes with excuses of his Sonnes sicknesse, and his complaints of the vniust and preiudiciall conditions whereunto hee was bound.

The Legat sends backe Tazzoni to the Count Fuentes, giuing him to vnderstand that hee knew wel that his legation had not bene vnderaken, but for the seruice of the King of Spain, at the intreaty of the Duke of Sessa his Ambassador: that he was not cōe for the Duke of Sauoy who maiketh him, and considered not that hee had done more for him then Father or Mother; that he cared not for his ratification, and much lesse to see

A see him, or to thanke him for his paines: that he excused his absence, by the tendernes of the infirmity of his Son, but if he thought that he would attend to proceed vntil that hee were cured, he was deceiued. The Count Fuentes answeres that the effect of the Treatie depends not vpon his signing, and that hee must not send vnto him to effect it. The Legat to cut off these temporisings and delayes, and to discover where the fault was, that the peace was not signed, aduised himselfe of a subtiltie, worthie of a Romaine, and of a Cardinall. Hee commands the Count Tazzoni to lay vnto the Count Fuentes, that he was aduertised from the Duke, that all the difficulties in this busines were framed by the Count, who restrayned the Dukes libertie, in the signing and execution of the Treatie. Hee had scarce entred into this discourse, when as the Count Fuentes (full of choller that all the blame should bee layd vpon him) went to horte, and came vnto the Legat, to whome hee discovered all the secret betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and him. Many dayes are spent in going and comming. In the end the King of Spain who desired to begin his raigne by warre, would haue no peace, but vanquished by the perswasions of the Duke of Lerma, who thought peace to be more profitable for his condition, hoping to gouerne his master more freely in the delights of peace, then in the troubles of war, sent vnto the Count Fuentes, that seeing they restored vnto the Duke of Sauoy his Countie, and that hee might keepe the Marquisate of Saluces, hee would imploy his forces elsewhere, & confirme the treatie of Lions. The Duke is forced to follow this course, there is no more Army for him. There was one complement yet remaining. The Duke was desirous to see the Legat, the paines which hee had taken deserued this vew and thanks. The Legat ment to go speedily to Rome. The Duke imbarques vpon the riuer of Po, to goe visit him, and sends a Post to aduertise him of the howre of his imbarking. Here was an accident which had almost spoyled all. This messenger reports vnto the Duke that he had met the Legat, and the Count Fuentes in Carosse together vpon the way, who returned when as hee aduertised them of his comming. The Duke discontented with this returne, sends them word that hee was gone backe. The Legat enters presently into a small barke, followes after, and overtakes him whereas the riuer of Tesin enters into Po. The Duke being aduertised, turnes head and ioynes with him. The striue who shall enter into the others boate, but the Duke leaps into the Legats & sits downe by him: they spent some words in complements, before they entred into the treatie of peace. The Legat hauing protested that in all this negotiation, he had nothing else in his thought, but the good of his Highnes Estate, but he was incountred with so many difficulties, & necessitie which ouerruled his affection, as hee was forced to prefer profitable & necessarie things, before that which which was goodly in shew. The Duke thanked him for the paine hee had taken, but so coldly, as the Legat found well, that he held not himselfe beholding to him. The one tooke his way to Thurin, and the other to Pavia, and so to passe to Rome. The Duke had signed, but hee was not yet well resolved to obserue the peace. The feare least Bourg should be lost before the conclusio of the Treatie, made his Ambassadors to resolute: E the Assurance which Bonnens now gaue the Duke, that hee would encounter all extremities, both of famine & force, made him vnwilling to performe the Treatie; sending Bely his Chancellor to Rome, to make his excuse that he signed it not. The Pope tooke it ill, that a Chancellor, a man of peace should intreat him to vndoe that which the Legat his Nephew had done, and sent him backe with his answer. But for all this the Duke seeks, to smother this peace in the cradell, and grounds his last hope vpon Bonnens, to whome hee sends the counterfigne, without the which he was bound not to yeeld it. This token was but counterfiet. D' Hostel played an other part, he made this his colour, to haue meanes to enter into the Cittadell, and to giue this counterfigne to Bonnens for his warrant; and thereby to assure him that if he had meanes to hold good a moneth, hee should disclame the signing of the ratification, and make a shew of disobedience, and hee should bee releued. D' Hostel went into the Cittadell, and found that miserie would not suffer them to vnt of resistance as they had done, that things were no more in the Estate that Bonnens had represented them, and that their necessi-

1601 ties were so extreame, as there was no meanes to suffer them any longer, being A prest without by the Kings Army, and within by cold and hunger, which made the Duke more tractable to yeeld that which hee could not hold, lending the ratification in the beginning of March, and at the same time the Cittadell was deliuered into the Kings power. The generall censures of this Peace were diuers. The King was pleased that the poise was apparent, and assured for his Estates: hauing for one Mar-quisate, more Earles and Marquises, then there are Gentlemen in the Marquisate of Saluces, inlarging his frontiers about thirty Leagues, and so restrayned the Dukes Estate on this side the Mountaines, as hee hath left two third partes, lost eight hundred Gentlemen, and a fort which hee himselfe (writing vnto Bouens) esteemed more then all the Marquisate, with Prouinces as fertill as any bee in France. It is true that the B Honour to keepe that which was the cause of the Warre remayned to the Duke, and by this meanes of a Peace hee hath no more neede of Spaniards nor of the Count of Fuertes, who did him alwaies some Spanish affront, and is free from all feare of the French, who kept Piedmont in awe while they had a retreat there. The Duke who neuer went out of the gates of Thurin without fix Companies of Horse, and enterrayned Garrisons which cost him more then the reuenues of the Countries exchanged, may now sleepe, and goe and come in safety.

This Moneth of March Louyse of Lorraine, Dowager of France. Widow to Henry the 3. King of France and of Poland died: her death was better known by the losse of such a light, then by the mourning of her Heires, or the Honour of her Funeralls, for the Duke C of Mercur her Brother to whom she left her goods and the execution of her will was then in Hungary. The Duchesse of Mercur attended on her vntill she died, and layed her Body in the Couent of Saint Claire, vntill shee might bee enterred with greater pompe. She desired to bee layed in one Tombe with the King, whose Body attendes vntill that the piety of the lyuing, may remember the condition of the dead, the which giues cause of amazement, that the Earth which neuer sayles for the life of Princes, should now want for their interment. She was Daughter to Nicholas Earle of Vande- mont. A most vertuous Princeesse, shewing in al her actions a singular piety and mode-tie. The same yeare also, Madam Francis of Orleans, Princeesse of Conde, Mother to the Count of Soissons, died in her house of Grenelles at Paris, the Funerall Pompe was ce- D lebrated in the Abbey of Saint Germain des pres. About the end of this yeare the Prin-cesse of Conty died of a great and languishing sicknesse, as shee went to her house at Fontenelle in Perche, to change the aire by the aduice of her Physicians, but shee changed her life, leauing one onely Daughter, the which the Count of Soissons married. Afterwards the Duchesse of Eguillon died, being Daughter to the Duke of Neuers decated, who left great cause of mourning to the Duke of Esguillon, eldest Son to the Duke of Alaine, and the rather for that she died in child-bed, & the Child also with her. The King in 40. daies had conquered all Sauoy, with in 40. after hee married, treated of a Peace, made the Queene in case to be a Mother, went in post from Lions and came to Paris, which bare his long absence impatiently. His returne gaue the world to vnder-stand how quiet & constant the affaires of France were, that a King which went a 100.

 Leagues with 12. only in his traine, was well assured of his subiects, and feared not his neighbours. The Queen followed by final iorneyes, & came to Fontainebleau, where she stayd not long, but came to Paris about S. Germain Faier, her first lodging was at Gon- dies house her first Gentleman of Honour, being in the suburbs of S. Germaine. The next was at Amers, superintendant of her house, & then she came to the Louure. The Parisiens prepared themselves & befought the King to giue them leau to make her a stately entry: but his Maiesty would haue the charges of this entry reserved for a more durable worke. All the Princeesses of the blood, with the chiefe Ladies of the Court and City presented themselves to kisse her hands, and to do their duties vnto her Maiesty. F She made much of all that the King fauored, and resolved to loue what hee Loued, framing her will in such sort vnto his, as she held his will for an vnwritten Lawe.

This yeare the Pope granted a Tubile and pardons to all the French that should goe

A goe v. fit the Church of Saint Croix in Orleans doing the workes of Christian charity. 1601.

An infinit number of people went thither from al parts of France, the King and Queene went thither with the first, and gaue meanes to helpe to build this Church, which had beene ruined during the furie of the first ciuill warres. The King layed the first stone of this building. An act worthie of a Christian King, the true successor of the pie-tie of S. Lewis his Predecessor. But whilst he gaine pardons, his enemies watch to surprise the best places of his Realme. He was disarmed vnder the assurance of the Peace.
 The armie of strangers was still whole together, and became fearefull to all Italie. All the Princes were troubled therat, and although they bee not well vnited together, yet when there is any question of common danger, they haue good correspondency. At

E Rome they sayd it was for Genewa, and that the Marquis of Aix was gone to intreate the Pope to fauour him with his blessing, and to fortifie him with his meanes. Many other discoueries were made touching this army, but time discovered that it was enterstayned for Marfelles. There is nothing so holy, but money will violate, nor so strong but it will force. The Count of Fuertes vpon promise of great recompence, had practised an enterprize very easie to execute, if the bargaine had held. It was a doing during the treatie of Peace with the Duke of Sauoy, who sent Don Sancho de Salina to Milano to the Count of Fuertes, with two of them which made this match, whereof the one gaue aduice to the President DuVair. He which had promised to deliuer the Tower of the Port for an entrie to the enemy, discovered himselfe to the Duke of Guise. La Goye (a gentleman of Prouence) was sent vnto the King, to beseech him to giue him leau to in-counter the with the like practise. The King who desires not to game by trecherie, said that he was content to keep his own, & to let the world know who did first trouble the peace. At that time an other enterprize was discovered vpon the Towne of Metz.
 The King sent the President Janin thither; the accused were brought to the prison of the Pallace at Paris. The proofs being weake, some were inlarged, vpon condition they should appeare when they were called for, his Maiestie commanding they should informe more amply against the rest, banishing two from the Townes of Metz, Thoul and Verdun. This great army finding no employment in France, made worke for the hangman in Italie, by the discouery of many conspiracies. The Seigneurie of Venice

D cauted a gentleman to be executed publicly, being appointed to be Gouvernor of Cre- ma, for that he was conuicted to haue intelligence with the Spaniard. Hee was of the house of Donati, but being preuented, his neere kinmen disauowed him, and abandoned him to the rigour of the Law. There was more suspition then prooffe against him: But in matters of State, presumptions conclude & condemne. Their desseins hauing failed in Italie and Prouence, the Sea armie of Spaine which had put all Italie in iealou-sie, turned head against the Turke, the troups embarked at a place called Vada, belonging to the State of Gena, but the body of this imbarquement was made in two troups, the one vnder Carlo Doria, the other vnder Prince Doria his Father. The Pope, the Duke of Sauoy, the great Duke of Florence, & the great Master of Malta, had giuen him

E some gallies for this enterprize. The Venetians did nothing, least they should breake the peace which they had with the Turke, they were in all about 70. Gallies. The Prince of Parma went as a voluntarie, and no man knew what was intended but the Ge-nerrail. The spoyle made by Francisco de Mendoza, Admirall of Aragon in the former yeares, had greatly annoyed not onely the vnited Prouinces, but also the Countries of Cleues, Iuliers, Westphalia, and the neighbour Prouinces in the taking of Rhin- berie, a Towne of importance, by reason of the passage, the seat and trafficke, seruing the Archduke as a place of retreat for Friseland; besides the great contributions of money which the garrison drew monthly from many neere places, as well friends as enemies, was a great preiudice to the Marchants of Holland, Zeland, Westfrif- land, and others in their trafficke of Germanie. Prince Maurice thought to take this I moate out of their eye, to chase the Spaniards out of Berk, and to assure the navigation of the Rhine, to the ease and profit of the Estates. In winter in the yeare 1600. and 1601. the Prince and States resolute what was to be done, & in Aprill & May they 1601 mustered their Garrisons & the choise of their troupes of Warre. Diuers bruits were spread abroad touching their desseigne, and the Arch-duke was watchfull where the army would make head, to oppose himselfe against the Enemy. But his forces being to weak to make an offensive War, he was forced to stand vpon his defence, expecting the succors that were sent him out of Italy. The Prince vnderstanding the estate of the Dukes affaires, and hauing his forces ready, made shew to attempt something vpon Flanders or Brabant, but suddenly he turned towards Guelderland, & the 10. of Iune he came with an army of 17. thousand men nere vnto Rhinberke (or Berk vpon the Rhine) the which hee did inuiron two daies after. Within the riuier of Rhine, right against Berk, there is an Iland which was kept by some soldiars for the Arch-duke, who hauing bin battered by some shot, as well from the States shippes, as by the Cannon that was planted on the riuers side, made no long resistance, so as the 18. day of the month the Iland was yeelded to the Prince, who presently caused two fortes to be built at the point towards Holland, and an other aboue towards Cologne, furnished with some initial peeces to shoote into the Towne; shutting vp the passages of the Riuier with his Ships, that no succors might come to the beseege. Moreouer the Prince hauing sommoned the beseege to yeeld the place, (which they refused, being neere foure thousand fighting men), he cast vp a large trench, in forme of a Cemicircle, round about the Towne, either end ioyning vnto the Rhine, fortified with fise great Bul-warkes, the which with the Iland and the Shippes compassed in the Towne of all sides. There was also a Bastion neerer vnto the Towne, & two bridges cast vpon the Rhine, by the which they went from the Iland, & from a place below, to the sayd Bastions & great Campe. He made also a more spacious halfe Moone then the first: hauing in a convenient distance made a deepe and large trench, of a League in compasse, either ende comming to the Rhine: In which trench by equall distances, were built 17. quadrangular fortes betwixt both the trenches were the Companies of horse and foote lodged, with passages to go in and out, so as neither the enemy within the Towne, nor any one without, could easily anoy them without great danger. Ferdinand d'Aualos was Gouvernor of Berk, who defended it with great resolution, expecting succors from the Arch-duke, who not able to raise the seege of Berk, by reason of the late arriual of 8000. men from the Count Fuentès, hee resolved to beseege Ostend, to make a diuersion. And although d'Aualos had resolved to die rather then to yeeld vp this place, yet seeing the imminent danger, without any hope of succors, being sommoned the third time by the Prince to yeeld the place, in the end he made a Composition, and gaue vp the Towne the last of Iuly, going forth with thirteene hundred soldiars, and as many hurt men, hauing lost about a thousand soldiars leauing a place in powre of the States, well furnished with victuells and Munitions of Warre, and threescore peeces of Cannon.

Berk yeelded.

Mauers taken by Prince Maurice.

Ostend besieged.

The Prince hauing giuen order for the Towne, returned to the Hage, where the States were assembled to provide for meanes to succor Ostend, which the Arch-duke had beseege. In his way he sent vnto Mauris the which was held by the Duke of Iuliers, after the decease of the Countesse of Valpurg. He sommoned the Gouvernor to yeeld, who finding himselfe to weak, abandoned the place. The Gouvernor complayned to his Master the Duke of Iuliers, but the controuersies betwixt him, Prince Maurice and the States, were referred to be determined by the Imperiall Chamber. The Arch-duke beseege Ostend, the which continued three yeares and eleauenth weekes: it was noted for the most memorable seege that euer was in Europe, whereas so many thousands of men ended their daies, and which endured so many hundred thousand Cannon shot before it yeelded. Ostend which hath bene the place whereas all the bravest subiects of Spaine for the Arch-dukes: And all the valiant English and Hollanders for Prince Maurice and the States, haue in emulation one of an other, shewed their courages: and whereas many French according to their diuers affections haue fought Honour. This Ostend is a Sea Towne in the Countie of Flanders, two Leagues from Oudenbourg, three from Nicuport and foure from Bruges, vpon the riuier of Iperle, the which runnes into the Sea, making it a good port for shipping. It was walled about but in the year

A yeare 1572. and in the yeare 1587. It was better fortified by the States of the vniited Prouinces. The particularities of this seege I omit, because they are written at large, and published by others. Ferdinand the Archduke being at the seege of Canisus, demanded succors from the Pope, and the Princes of Italy. The Duke of Mantua was Lieutenant Generall. The Pope sent him his Nephew, John Francis Aldobrandino, hauing deliuered into his hands the blessed Standard with Ceremonies: The King of Spaine sent him sixe thousand Germanes, and the Great Duke of Tuscany two thousand foote: the time was spent in contending for command betwixt the Duke of Mantua and Aldobrandino, who being Marshall of the Campe would receiue no direction from the Archduke. Great men for the iealousie of command, loose great occasions: but death ended this quarrell; Aldobrandino dying three months after of a Quotidian feauer, the Troupes which he conducted continued still at the seege. The Pope disposed of his Estates to Siluester Aldobrandino his Sonne; his obsequies were made at Rome with great pompe.

Rochepot being Ambassador in Spaine, certaine French Gentlemen (among the which his Nephew was) had a quarrell with some Spaniards, who did iniury them, and cast their Clothes into the Water, they being a swimming. The Spaniards had the worst, and some were hurt and slaine. Their Kinsmen demanded Iustice of the King, (who commanded his Officers to doe it) but the Ambassadors lodging was forced, and the Gentlemen drawne forth to prison, notwithstanding any thing that he could say or doe, to maintaine the liberty of his place, the which is inuolable euen among enemies. The King was so offended with this iniury, as hee commanded his Ambassador to returne, giuing the King of Spaine to vnderstand, that hee assured himselfe, that he would do him reason, when hee had well considered what cause he had to complaine. Wherevpon all Trafficke was forbidden betwixt these two Realmes. The Pope fearing that this violence done vnto the Ambassador of France, could not passe without some feeling, and that this Coale might kindle the fire of Warre betwixt these two great Kings: hee sent into Spaine to haue the prisoners, the which were sent vnto him: and the Pope deliuered them presently vnto the Lord of Betunes the Kings Ambassador at Rome; and so the Peace was continued.

Monsieur de la Rochepot Ambassador in Spaine.

The Ambassadors of Venice were better intreated in France. That great and wise Senate holding themselves bound by the Lawes of friendship, to deplore the misfortune, and to reioyce at the prosperity of their friends, hauing bene long troubled for the afflictions of France, they send a great and solemne Ambassage to congratulate the fruit of the Kings victories, and the beginning of his Marriage. The Ambassadors were chosen out of the Procurators of Saint Mark, and of the cheife men of the State. They came to Paris, the King sent the Marquis of Rhosny to conduct them to Fontainebleau, and to intreat them, to bee contented with their Reception in that place whereas the Queene was; seeing their Ambassage was common to both, and that for the indisposition of her greatnesse, it could not bee at Paris; which occasion did renew the ioyes of the Court, the which was in so great Tranquillity as it seemed neuer to haue bene in trouble. The Great Turke sent Bartholomew de Cueur his Physitian vnto the King, to acquaint him with the Estate of his affayres, and to intreat him to mediate a Truce in Hungary. When as this man spake of the Turkes power hee did so extoll it, as if hee had bene able to vanquish all the Princes of Christendome, not excepting Pope nor Emperor, so as the King of France did not meddle in it. Hee presented a Dagger and a Cymiter vnto the Kings Maiesty, whereof the Hilts and Scabbards were of Gold, garnished with Rubies, and a Plume of Herons feathers. The King related vnto him what hee had done in Sauiy, and complayned that (to the preiudice of ancient Capitulations) not onely the English were distracted from the Banner of France, (vnder whose guide and protection they were bound 1601. bound to trafficke) but also the Flemings, Hollanders and Zelanders were comprehended vnder the Banner of England. To this complaint hee added another, against the courtes and violencies of the Pirats of Algier, and the Coast of Barbary, saying that if the Iustice of the great Turke, did not cause these Piracies to cease, he should haue no reason to beleue his friendship. It was at such a time as the Great Turke affayres were very confused and troubled in Asia, by the reuolt of the Seriuano, and almost desperate in high Hungary. The King of Persia had sent Ambassadors to the Christian Princes, to animate them to make War against him, promising to contribute an Army of a hundred and fifty thousand horse, and three score thousand foote, offering vnto the Christians, liberty of Religion, and free Trafficke in his Kingdomes. His Spas and Iannissaries murmured against him, and the bad carriage of the Empreffe his Mother, (who during his Delights and Dissolutions held the reyns of Government) did alwayes through the mallice and frailty of her Sexe, support the worst Councils and Resolutions. They complayned dayly of the Mother and the Sonne, speaking of her as the Romaines did of Agrippina, crying out; that they should intreat her worse, then by a simple banishment: and of him, as the Souldiars spake of Gallienus, whom they esteemed not to be borne, but for the pleasures which are in and vnder the belly, and to ruine all the world with his delights.

At this time there sprang vp Religious men in France, who said they were true Observers of the Order of S. Francis, and that the Franciscans and Capuchins did not maintaine it so exactly, but they needed Reformation. The King gaue them a Count at Beaufort, & by the example of this piety many other places desired it. They would lodge at Balmette neere vnto Angers, the which had bene Founded by Rene King of Sicilia. The Franciscans (who could not indure to be dispossessed by these Recollats) beleeged them, offered to forde their Gates, and to scale their Walles. The Besieged defended not themselves with Words and Excorcismes, but with Stones, and in such Choller, as if the People had not come, the Scandall had not ended without Murder. The Prouinciall seeing that the Recollats would not receiue him, and that the Bishop would not suffer him to use force, appealed, as from an abuse of their Establishment. The Recollats shew vnto the Court, that they are the true Children and Disciples of S. Francis, living according to the Rule and Discipline that was obserued in Italy, from whence the good Precepts of the Reformation of Regulars were drawne, that if those of the Famely of Obseruance, and of Capuchins were tolerated & honoured in France, they should be of no worse Condition. This cause was the Argument of a famous pleading in the Court Parliament, in the which Seruin the Kings Aduocate said; That a Reformation was necessary not only in the Order of the Franciscans or Grey-Friars, but also in all others, but they must be careful, not to transforme by Nouelties, instead of Reforming by Censures, alledging many reasons against the bringing in of new Orders. Whereupon the Court pronounced that there was abuse, and restored the Ancient Religious to the Count of Balmette, forbidding all religious Men of the Order of Grey-Friars, to go out off the Realme, without licence from the King or their Superiors. Iealous and distrustfull heads gaue it out, that the Peace was in weak estate, when as after the injury done vnto Rocheport in Spaine, and the forbidding of Trafficke, they see the King gonne sodainely to Calais, and that from thence hee had sent the Duke Biron into England. The Archdukes tooke a sodaine Alarm, and to that end sent the Count Sena vnto the King, to deliuer vnto him the state of the Siege of Ostend, and to beseech him not to suffer that their enemies should thinke that these approaches should be to their aduantage, and that their rebellion should be fauoured by an example so hatefull to all Princes. The King sent the Duke of Esquilion to visit them, and to assure them that his intention was not to trouble the Peace, but onely to visit his Frontier, and to prouide for the fortifications. They did not generally beleue this, for although he made this Voyage in Post, many thought that he would embrace this occasion of the siege of Ostend, and all the Court followed him, as to some great Exploite. And for that he would not haue the world in suspence of his dessein

A dessein, he gaue the Governours of his Prouinces to vnderstand that the cause of his going to Calais was but to visit his frontier, and to prouide for that which should bee necessary to assure it, not from present dangers but from those that might happen. He declared also that he had no other dessein, then the preferuation of Peace with all his neighbours, to enioy that which God had giuen him. But there were other practices which could not be dispersed but by the Kings presence.

The Queene of England sent Sir Thomas Edmonds to visit the King, and the King returned her the like by the Duke of Biron. Hee went accompanied with a hundred and fifty Gentlemen. The Count of Auvergne was there as vnkowne, but his quality discovered him. There was nothing omitted that might be for the reception of an Ambassador, & somewhat more. Being at London many Noblemen receiued him, and accompanied him to Bisling, where he rested a day or two before he did see the Queene who made him knowe that shee was honoured by her Subiects aboute other Princes. A Prince should loofe no occasion to let Strangers see the greatness of his Estate, to giue them cause to admire him, and to maintaine his Subiects in the dutie which they owe him. The Queene of England who hath made good prooffe that Women may raigne, as well and as happily as Men, obserues this better then any Prince of her age, making all them that followed the Duke of Biron in this Legation, to giue the like Iudgement. The Queene being set in State, all the French Gentlemen entred first, but when as shee discovered the Duke of Biron, whom shee knew by the description they had made of his Face and stature, shee spake with a loud voyce; Ha Monsieur de Biron, how haue you taken the paynes to come and see a poore old Woman, who hath nothing more liuing in her, then the affection shee beares vnto the King, and her perfect iudgement to knowe his good Seruants, and to esteeme Knights of your sort. As she spake this, the Duke made a low reuerence, & the Queene rose from her Chaire, to embrace him, to who he deliuered the charge he had from the King, and withall his Maiesties Letters the which she read. She thanked the King for his remembrance of her: but she said she could not conceale, that as there was nothing vnto a heart (like vnto hers) full of affection and desire more pleasing, then to see and heare what it desired, so could she not but feelee an extreme torment, to see her selfe deprived of the sight and presence of the obiect which shee had most desired, whose actions she esteemed not onely immortal but diuine, being ignorant whether she should more enuy his Fortune, then loue his Vertue and admire his Merits; to much the one & the other did excede the greatest maruailes in the world. That she could not say that a courage which feared nothing but the falling of the Pillars of Heauen, should feare the Sea, or not trust vnto it for a passage of seuen or eight houres, blaming them rather which had not instructed him as well to contemne the Waues of the Sea, as the dessein of his enemies vpon the Land. From these speeches, shee fell into some bitterness of Complaints, which shee deliuered with a little vehemencie, saying; That after shee had succored this Prince with her Forces, Purse, and Meanes, and if she could haue done it, with her owne blood, and had as much desired the happy successe of his affayres as himselfe, and the ruine of his Enemies more then himselfe, they made no accompt of her, forcing her to thinke that the loue they bare her was but for the hope of commodities they might drawe from her, the which being dried vp, all affection was cold. That they had sought her in the torment to forget her when the time was calme. That they preferred newe friendship before the olde, Wisedome before Iustice, and Profit before Reason. And for a signe of Inhumanity, they refused her her owne. Then taking the Duke of Biron, she led him to a Window where shee continued her discourse in softer and milder termes. There she gaue her hand vnto all the Gentlemen which the Duke of Biron presented vnto her: among them all shee noted Creygy to be Sonne in Lawe to Leffiguieres. She commanded him to approach neere vnto her when all had done, to whom shee declared what esteeme shee would make of him for his sake, whom shee held to bee without peere, saying; That if there were two Crey answered; That he would thinke himſelfe happy, if by the Kings commandment any occaſion were offered worthy of her ſeruice, to witneſſe vnto her Maieſty, that he did partake in the deſire which his Father in law had alwayes had, to giue her ed him to remember. The Duke of Biron receiued all the honours of the Queene and State, that might be giuen to ſo great a Perſonage, the particularities whereof I omit for breuities ſake. Having finiſhed his Legation, hee tooke his leaue of the Queene, to whom ſhe gaue a great Preſent, and ſo diſmiſſed him with very gracious ſpeeches. He found not the King at Calais at his returne, who was gone backe to Fontainebleau againſt the Queenes lying downe, where he had left her, & the Duchefſe of Bar with her. All France attended the Fruit of this Birth, as the full of their Felicities, aſſuring themſelues, that by the birth of a Daulphin, they ſhould finde all that which forepaſſed ages, and that which was to come, could deſire. Ten dayes before his birth, the Earth quaked in many parts of Europe. The great Duchefſe who deſired greatly to be neere the Queene; lent her a rich Cradle, exquisitely made at Florence, hoping it ſhould ſerue for a Daulphin (for ſhee would not haue giuen it with ſo good a will for another Sexe) intreating the Gouvernor of Lions by her Letters to fa-uour the paſſage, and his diligence that had charge of it, to the end that he might arrive in time, and not to ſuffer any to open the Coſers.

The Queene

Daughter.

The Spaniards were no leſſe content then the French, ſaying that they had rather the Queene ſhould begin with a Daughter then with a Sonne, leaſt they ſhould fall into the accidents, which Iealouſſie and Ambition do breed, when the Children appeare ſo ſoone to ſolicite them to bee gone; when as their ages are confounded, that the one is in the flower, the other in the ſeaſon of fruites, the which is moſt capable to command and rule, and that the deſire to ſucceed may not giue occaſion to trouble the order of Nature, and maketh the one repeat that they are Fathers, and declares the other vnworthy to bee Children.

This great ioy for the birth of the Infanta of Spaine, was mixt with ſome griefe for the fruitleſſe retreat of their great Army at Sea, which had kept their deſſeigne ſo ſecret, as for a time they knew not whether they would attempt any thing vpon Aſia, Affrick, or Europe. In the beginning of Iuly they came to Naples, to prouide great ſtore

A ſtore of armes and a good number of Petards, which made the world to belecue two things, the one was that he would arme ſome ſubiects of the great Turke, that were in-clyned to riſe: the other that he had intelligence vpon ſome place, to ſurpriſe it with ſmall force. And for that foote-men are weak if they be not ſupported by horſe, they made prouiſion alſo of fifteene hundred or two thouſand furnitures for horſe. The Venetiens ſeeing them to bend their courſe to Meſſina, entred into newe apprehenſions, that if they attempted any thing in Albania, they ſhould haue company in their gulph.
 They were not long in this ſuſpence, for they ſet ſayle and came to Trepany, which is the pointe and promontory of Sicilia neereſt vnto Affricke. Cigala was parted from Conſtantinople with fifty Galleys, to finde ſome occaſion to charge this army in their retreat, if he ſhould finde any part of them diſperced, and to fruſtrate their enterpriſes.
 When they ſee that they were paſt the Ilands of Baleares, they doubted no more that his deſſeigne was for Alger, it was giuen out that they ſhould be aſſiſted by eight or ten thouſand horſe-men of the Moores and ſome Chriſtians. But the Turkes who prepared themſelues to receiue them, would not bee in danger of their enemies and of their ſlaues, knowing that as they could hope for no fauour of the one, ſo the victory of them that ſerue them is alwayes cruell towards their Maſters, for this reaſon, and to take from the Chriſtians meanes to fauour this Army, they retired into the Towne all that liued along the Sea-coaſt, and did ſhut vp in Caues at Alger, about ten thouſand ſlaues, tyed with double Chaines, and well garded.

C This enterpriſe was iuſt and commendable, and worthy of the firſt militarie executions of a Prince, which muſt beginne his raigne by ſome Act of great reputation.
 The Spaniards in deede did promiſe much, and ſayd openly, that their King would make knowne the affection hee bare vnto Chriſtendome. Beſides the generall fruites which was expected, this attempt made a great and profitable diuerſion of the Turkes forces, in fauour of the Arch-duke Ferdinand who was at the ſiege of Canisus. Prince Doria the more to fauour this deſſeigne, intreated the great Maſter of Malta in the behalfe of the King of Spaine, to ſend ſome Galleys into the Leuant Seas, to make ſome ſpoiles there, to drawe on the Turkiſh Army, and to aduertise him of his courſe.
 The which was ſo happely executed, as with ſiue Galleys they runne into Morca.
 D Beauregard a French Knight had the charge to plant a Petard to the port, of Chateauneuf whileſt that Bouillon, and Tioliere alſo French Knights ſhould giue the ſcaladoe, on the other ſide; Where they entred with ſuch fury as the Turkes who were ſeauen or eight hundred men, could not hinder them from forcing of the ſecond port. They tooke a hundred and foure ſcore ſlaues, cloyed eightene peeces of Cannons, ſpyled and burnt the Towne, and in foure houres ſpyled the whole Country. The Spaniſh fleet recovered the coaſt of Affricke: as men were banded againſt it at Land, ſo the Windes made Warre againſt it at Sea. Prince Doria finding both Heauen, Earth and Sea, oppoſite to his deſſeigne, commanded a retreat, without attempting any thing. The Prince of Parma deſiring rather to ſayle in iudgement then in cour-rage, ſayd vnto Prince Doria, that hee ſhould not ſuffer ſo great an Army to returne without attempting any thing, the which had no other effect but to haue mooued a mighty enemy, who to bee reuenged of a dead enterpriſe ready to be executed, would reſolue to inuade the King of Spaines Eſtates of all ſides. The old man answered ſodenly. I knowe well my charge, my haires are growne white in learning it. Your excellency are to giue account vnto the King my Maſter but of a pike, and I muſt anſwere for an army, in the which if fortune hath ſayled mee, yet will I not that other partes requiſite to my charge, as courage, experience, nor authority ſhall ſayle mee, or that they ſhall reproch mee to haue erred therein. A goodly and memorable anſwere, to ſhew that a Prince howe great ſouer hee bee in an Army, muſt onely ſtudie to obey and followe, and not lead or goe before, the which belongs onely to the Generall. So Prince Doria hauing diſmiſſed his Army, tooke his way to Genoa, choſing rather to giue them ſubiect to murmur at his retreat, then vainly to haue attempted an impoſſible enterpriſe.

The Popes Gallies stayed at Barcelona for the Duke of Parma, who was gone into Spain to kiss the Kings hands. Those of the great Duke of Florence passed to Genoa and from thence to Lisborne. Most of the men of Warre came to refresh themselves in the Duchy of Milan, wholly to ruine the Country. But the Count of Fuentes found a new inuention to make this newe oppression sweete and supportable. He vnderooke to make a passage for trafficke by Water, betwixt Milan and Pavia, and caused them to worke in the trenches to make the riuers betwixt the two Townes to meete. The people seeing so great commodities that might recompence all their losses, endured their burthen patiently. But the Count of Fuentes incountred many difficulties in this desseigne, which made him to desist, and the people to renewe their complaints, when they saw themselves surcharged, and that the souldiars come from the army of Alger, liued in Lombardie according to their owne discretion. He intreated the Duke of Savoy to lodge the regiment of Barbo in the Marquilate of Saluces, but knowing how hard it is to dislodge the Spaniard, he excused himself Wisely vpon the miseries & generall ruine of all his Estates.

In the end these poore Italians beeing in Alexandria were cast. The King of Spaine Officers tooke and foulded vp their Enseignes, disarmed them and left them almost naked, without any other pay then ten shillings of our Country money. The want of money would not suffer them to do otherwise, the King of Spaine being forced to furnish money to the Suisses and Germanes, and his treasure beeing almost exhaust, through the great charges of this last Army at Sea, the which did not answer the opinion which Europe had conceived of so great a preparation. Yet the occasion of well doing was goodly and fauorable. The lanissayres were mutined against the great Turke, and had stirred vp the people, for the disorder of his carriage, his carelesnesse, idlenesse and stupidity. Things were in the worst termes that might bee, and they talked of nothing but to choose a Prince that was more Martiall: they drewe seauen of his greatest fauorits forth of the Serrailia, & forced him to consent that those heads should serue as an oblation to the people, promising to haue more care of the administration of Iustice and the affaires of State. The City was fine or sixe daies together in danger to bee sacked. If Christendō had made vse of this diuision, & of the reuolts of Asia, there had bin no doubt of the ruine of the Ottomans. If the great Turke auoided the storme which he feared by the forces of Spaine, Sigismund Battori Prince of Transilvania was quite defeated by the of the Empeior. He had drawne together an army of eightene thousand horse and 22 thousand toote, to recover his authority in Transilvania siō whence he had bin shamefully expelled. He lodged himselfe vpon a Mountaine, to giue Lawe vnto all the Countrey; Sodenly when as this aduice was brought vnto Michel Vanoide of Valachia, and to Georg Basta Generall of heigh Hungary, they let sleepe their priuate hatred to vnite their wills, gathering all their troupes speedely together, beeing in all but eightene thousand men, and present themselves vnto the enemy, lodging vpon an other hill right against him, but much lower. The Transilvanian being annoyed by their Canon, came downe from the hill into a valley betwixt both: The Imperialists compassed them in, and charge them in such sort as they slue eleauen thousand vp on the place, the rest fled with their Generall, who cursed God and his Fortune, loosing his baggage, forty peeces of Cannon and 150. Enseignes which were sent to the Emperour to make his victory absolute.

Battory went to the great Turkes Court, to begge for newe succors, but he was not welcome, the Turke beeing discontented for the losse of Alba Regalis, and for that the intelligences which hee had with the Prince of Valachia, did not succede according to his intentions. The Emperour did long foresee, that ambition should be more powerfull in the Valachians heart then duty, many reasons entertained him in these doubts, the acts of absolute power which hee had done in Transilvania, the fortification of places, the warre against the Moldauian, and especially his proud and imperious disposition, made them beleue that hee had resolved to make one soueraignty of three Prouinces. True it is that to free them from these ielousies, hee had sent his Deputies to

A to the Emperour, to assure him that he would not hold Transilvania, but at his commande, and seeing that his assurances were weaker then their doubts and apprehensions, he sent his Wife, and one of his Children for hostages, and in the end came himselfe to giue an account of his actions, confessing that the rigors which he had vsed vpon the Transilvanians, were not to reuenge his owne priuate passions, but the publike iniuries in the disloyaltie of this people, which were reuoluted against the Emperour. The Turke beleued that the Valachian would not passe the riuier of Danuby to make warre against him, and that he would giue the Emperour good wordes, and he should haue good effects. The Valachian (as full of courage as of ambition) sought but some worthy occasion, which shewed his constancie and loyalty to the Emperour, & tooke from the Turke all hope, that if he could not be his friend openly, yet hee would serue him vnder hand. To this effect he propounded an enterprise vpon Thrace to diuert the Turkes forces (as Scipio did vpon Carthage to free Italy) demanding no other fruits of the conquest, then the prooffe of his dutie and zeale to the common good of Christendome, swearing and protesting that hee would rather drinke Bulls blood, then euer to entertaine a peace or friendship with them, whose ruine and extermination he had sworne. The Emperour knew well that hee sware but to couer his disloyaltie, nor did not affect the generall cause of the Empire, but to aduance his priuate passions, and therefore hee resolved to be assured of him. George Basta obserued his actions, and represented them in such sort vnto the Emperour, as he gaue him commission to bring him prisoner to Prague. The Valachian offered to draw his sword against him that brought this charge, but he was prevented by Bastas people. The Turke was forrie for it, knowing that all the submission which he made in shew to the Emperour, should not alter him from his first affections, but this grieue was nothing in respect of the losse of Alba Regalis. It is a small Towne seated in a Marishe, which makes the approaches difficult, it was taken by the Duke Mercure at the third assault, in lesse then thirteene daies, he set nine hundred Christian prisoners at libertie, & tooke 2000. Turkish women, and children: when the besieged did see that they could not saue themselves from the Christians, they set fire of their munition, ruined the Castell, and a good part of the wall, yet the spoyle was esteemed at three millions of gold, for that all the riches of Buda was there, as in the place of surety: all that bare armes were cut in peeces, except the Bashas and some hundred souldiars with him, who being rettyred into a strong Bastion, the Duke Mercure receiued them to mercy, and granted them their liues onely, which gracethey had not deserued, for that they had not aduertised the Duke of the mines that were prepared in diuers parts of the Towne, wherewith some Christian souldiars had bene spoyled, the Towne much indamaged, and the Duke himselfe in great danger. Hassan Basta great Vezir, came with an army of threescore and tenne thousand men, to recover it againe before it were victualled, and the ruines repayed, but hee was forced to abandon it with losse and disgrace, through the valour and wisdom of the Duke Mercure. And so Alba Regalis a famous towne, being the ancient seat of the Kings of Hungary, returned to the Christians.

The Valachian offering to draw his sword against Colonel Pesz, who had charge to seaze on him, a Captaine of the Walons (being more aduanced then the rest) thrust him through the bodie with his halberd, whereof falling downe, hee was presently slaine by the rest, who cut off his head without any resistance of his people that were present. In his tent they found letters which discovered his treacherie against the Imperial Maiesie, and his wicked desseins, so as the Valachians themselves, who had been greatly incensed by this death, hauing seene and red the letters, were pacified, saying that he had bene deseruedly slaine. The Generall Basta made a proclamation. That all the Valachians souldiars that would, should haue leaue to depart, or if they would serue the Emperour, they should be entertayned with the like pay, in taking of a new oath: so as many were enrolled vnder Basta. By this meanes Basta this yeare reduced almost all Transilvania vnder the Emperour. Yet Battory who had bene defeated, attempted all meanes to recover his lost Countrey, and his Soueraigne authoritie, being supported 1601. not onely by the Transiluanians, but also by the Tartares and Turkes. Before and since A his last defeat, he had sought to surprize Clausembourg, but in vaine: afterwards he liued as a Vagabond in the Mountaynes and Deserts with fewe peopie. And for that the Generall Bastia did still presse him on euery side, finding no place of Safety, hee sent his Agents to Bastia, beseeching him, to suffer him to inioy his Principality, and that he would keepe no Garrisons nor Magazines but with the Emperors good liking. Bastia made him no other answer, but that he must execute the Emperors commandments, but he should do well to submit himselfe to the Emperour to haue his fauour: but Bastory would not follow his good Councell, yet in the end he was forced vnto it in the yeare 1602. Ferdinand the Archduke, hauing spent much time at the siege of Canisla, in the ende was forced to leaue it with shame and disorder, loosing his Artillery, and Baggage, and abandoning the sicke & wounded. He lost his reputation there (for the good & had successe of enterprises are euer imputed to the General) although it were true, that the diuision among the Commanders of the Christians Army, the great want of victuals, & the fury of the Plague, gaue this aduantage vnto the enemy. The Duke of Biron came to Fontenbleau, whereas the King, Queene and Daulphine remayned, he gaue an account of his Ambassage into England, & deliuered the Queens Letter vnto his Maiesty. He continued in Court vntill the ende of the yeare, and presented vnto him the three Estates of Bresse, Beauguy, Veromey and Gex; whom the King receiued as graciously, as if they had bin Frenchmen by birth and affection; he confirmed their Privileges, and made them feele the fruits of this change. He erected a Presidiall Court at Bourg, depending vpon the Parliament at Dijon, notwithstanding any opposition made by that of Grenoble, preceeding that the Countreies exchanged should hold the place of the Marquisate of Saluces, & be incorporate vnto Daulphine. He releued the Countreies exchanged, in their Impositions & Taxes, and with such moderation, as the most miserable, promised vnto the elues happines, vnder his sweet subiectio. Among other speeches, which the King vsed vnto the Deputies, these were noted. It is reasonable (said he) seeing you speak French naturally, that you should be subiect to a King of France. I am well pleased that the Spanish tongue shall remaine to the Spaniard, & the Germane tongue to the Germane, but all the French must belong to me. The Daulphine made his first entry into Paris the 30. day after his birth: the Port was beautified with Armes. The pompe was of a Cradle in a Litter, whereas the Lady of Monglas sat with the Nurce. The Provoost of Marchants & Sheriffes, went out off the City to meete him. The Gouverneile made answer to the Oration. His first lodging was at Amets house. Two dayes after he was carried back to S. Germain in Lay, & to the end the people might see him, passing through the City, the Nurce held him at her Breast. The King had determined to conduct the Queene to Eloys, but the desire he had to instruct the Duchesse of Bar his Sister in his Religion, stayd them all at Paris, whether he had sent for the most learned Prelats & Diuines, to satisfie her in the presence of such Ministers as she had brought with her. But they coiured her not to yeeld vnto this change, nor to dismember her selfe from the body and society of the children of God, to bow her knees vnto Idolatry. She continued so constant in her beleefe, as she made a protestation, that if her Religion were preiudicial to the Estates of the Duke of Lorraine, she was ready to returne into Bearn, beseeching the King to suffer her to end her life as she had begun it. So as the Cōferences vpon this subiect remained vnprofitable, & were of no more effect, then that which was made at Ratisbonne at the same time, & for the same cause. The King hauing settled as happy a Peace in France as could be desired, he sought to redresse the disorders which could not be cured during the violence of the War. The King did two things to reforme the disorders of the Treasure, in the one he cut off a great number of Officers belonging to the Treasure, & in the other he caused a great and seuer search to be made of their abuses. The more Officers the King hath for the managing of his Treasure, the lesse profit comes vnto his Coffers, for that a great part is spent in their entertainment. So as it was resolved at the Estates held at Roan, to suppress the Offices of the Treasurers of the Generalities of France by death without hope of reuiuing.

His speech to the Deputies.

The Daulphine first entry into Paris the 30. Octob. 1601.

A Conference to instruct the Kings Sister.

Many of the Treasurers discharged.

A As for the abuses of Treasurers, their couctoufines was so great and their abuses so countenanced, as no man liued happily but they. Such as robbe the Poore die in prisons and are hanged: but they that steale from the King and the publicke, are at their ease. When as Rhefny was called to bee Superintendant of the Treasor, they were out of hope to do their busines as they had wont. By his aduice the King commanded a strict search to bee made of their abuses in the Treasure, and to that ende he erected a Chamber (or Court) which hee would haue called Royale, consisting of Iudges chosen out of his Soueraigne Courts.

B And for that they had giuen the King to vnderstand, that nothing did so much impoverish his Realme, as the transport of gold & siluer, the which was vtually by the sufferance of Officers, he therefore reuiued the ancient Lawes for the transporting of gold and siluer, or bullion out of the Realme, adding paine of death therevnto, and losse of all their goods that should do to the contrary, the third whereof should go vnto the Informer. He commanded all Gouvernors to haue a care of the obseruation of these prohibitions, and not to grant any passports to the contrary, vpon paine to be declared partakers of these transports, and for their Secretaries that should countersigne them, confiscation of their goods and perpetuall banishment. But the forbidding of the transportation of gold and siluer is not the onely meanes to make a Realme abound therewith, if the vse of it within bee not well ordered. And therefore the King did forbid the superfluous vse of gold and siluer in Lace or otherwise vpon garments. This Edict did greatly trouble the Ladies in Court, yet it was obserued for that it was general and excepted none: the King himselfe did frowne of a Prince of his house, who had not yet thought of this reformation. The King continuing the same care to settle all things in good Estate, seeing that forraine Coynes went at a higher rate in his Realme then where they were coyned, he commanded that the vse of forraine coynes should bee forbidden, after a certaine time giuen to the people to put it away, restoring gold to his iust value. This commandement was iust, but it was a great ruine to the peopole, for the Strangers seeing that their Coynes were not currant among vs, discontinued the trafficke, and liued without that, without the which wee thought they could not liue. Those which were wont to come to Lions went to Geneua, where the D Duckates were raised as much as we had abated them. The King by all these Edicts had nothing releued the necessities of the Nobility, if hee had not provided for Vsuries, which haue ruined many good and ancient houses, filled Townes with vnprofitable persons, and the Country with miseries, and inhumanity. Hee found that Rents constituted after ten or eight in the hundred did ruine many good families, hindered the trafficke and commerce of Marchandise, and made Tillage and Handicraftes to bee neglected, many desiring through the easines of a deceitfull gaine, to liue idly in good Townes of their Rents, rather then to giue themselves with any paine to liberall Arts, or to Till and Husband their inheritances. For this reason (meaning to inuite his subiects to inrich themselves with more iust gaine, to content themselves with more moderate profit, and to giue the Nobility meanes, to pay their debtes.) hee did forbid all Viury or constitution of Rentes at a higher rate then sixe pounds five shillings for the hundred. The Edict was verified in the Court of Parliament, which considered that it was alwaies preiudiciall to the common-weale to giue money to Vsurie: for it is a serpent whose biting is not apparent, and yet it is so sensible as it peerceth the very heart of the best families.

The affaires of the Realme beeing in so great tranquillity, as the King had no care but to enioye the fruites of Peace. Hee made choise of Ambassadors to send to forraine Princes that were in League with him. Barraux was named for Spain, Betunes for Rome, the Count Beaumont was choien for England, and the President Fresnes Camaye to goe to Venice, who had a particular aduice giuen him, the which for that it is of consequence and serues for instruction to others in the like charges, deserves to bee noted. It hath alwaies beene obserued at Venice, betwixt the Popes Nomis and Princes Ambassadors that remaine there, that the last come is alwaies first visited by the others

It happened that Huraut de Messe the King's Ambassador at Venice, hauing bene twice or thrise sent backe thither by his Maiestie, and no other Ambassador: at his last returne the Popes Nuncio refused to visit him, saying, that he was not a new Ambassador, and that it was in him to visit him, the which he did, as well for that they could not take his returne for the beginning of a new Ambassage, from this complement of courtesie, the Popes Nuncio would draw a consequence of dutie, and would challenge a right to bee visited first. So as the Ambassador of Spain hauing made difficultie to visit the Nuncio, attending it first from him according to the ancient order, they stood so long vpon this Ceremonie, as they passed all the time of their Legation without visiting one another. And therefore the King foreseeing that if de Fresnes Canzy were not informed of these particularities, hee might haue bene surprised in this Complement of visiting. In this discourse of Ambassadors, let vs see the issue of two important Ambassages, the one for the King at Thurin, the other for the Duke of Sauoy at Paris, & both for the swearing of the peace. James Mites of Myolans Lord of Saint Chaumont, Knight of both the Kings Orders, was commanded to goe to Thurin to receiue the Dukes oath. Hee went well accompanied with gentlemen, and neuer Ambassador was better receiued then hee was in Sauoy & Piedmont. D' Albigny Gouverneur of Sauoy feasted him at Chibery like a Prince, the Duke commanding him to entertaine him in all places as himselfe. Comming to Thurin he was entertaigned with all honour that might bee, and the ceremonie being ended, hee tooke his leaue, and was no lesse honoured at his departure, then at his comming, giuing the Ambassador a Iewell of foure thousand Crownes, and to all the Gentlemen Horses. The Marquis of Lullins came into France to take the Kings oath. The Ceremonie was done at the Celestins in Paris, according to the accustomed manner and forme vsed in the like Treaties, and in the presence of many Princes of the blood, Noblemen, and Councillors of State, the Act being signed by the King, by Villeroi, and Forget Secretarie of State.

The Seigneurie of Genewa intreated the King to giue them the Balewike of Gen, as a necessarie thing for the safetie of their Estate. The King answered, that being concluded by the treatie which hee had made with the Duke of Sauoy, that the lands exchanged for the Marquisate of Saluces, should remaine vnted and incorporated to the Crowne, hee requested them to rest satisfied with this condition, and not to hope for any alteration, for this consideration, these Countiees being of one condition with the other Prouinces of the Realme, the would not admit any diuersitie in their Lawes, hee therefore established the exercise of the Romish religion, and sent the Baron of Lux to put the Bishop of Genewa in possession of the Churches of his Diocese, causing Masse to be said in the Churches of Gen. They of Genewa made fasts, and publike prayers, to the end (sayd they) to keepe the Idolls from their walls.

We must add to this discourse, one of the most famous Impostures, (as some said) that euer age had scene. It was a generall braite throughout Europe, that Don Sebastian King of Portugal was aliue, and the Portugalls did presently giue credit thereunto. It was Atheisme among them not beleue its inhumanitie in Princes, and Common-weales not to succour him, and iniustice not to intreat him as a King. Many Impostures haue bene scene throughout the world, but none like vnto that which is spoken of this prisoner. It is aboute twentie yeares that the friends of D. Sebastian King of Portugal haue lamented his misfortune, & the Moors reioyced thereat; the realme of Portugal made his funeralls, and the King of Spain giuen a hundred thousand Crownes for his bodie. Foure Kings haue reigned since, accounting the election of Don Antonio, and yet there is a man found (say the Spaniards) so audacious, as he will trouble all the world, to make them beleue that hee is the true King D. Sebastian of Portugal. He presented himselfe to the Seigneurie of Venice, and demands audience. He relates vnto them the Historie of his life, and the raigne of his Fathers in Portugal, his

A his defeate in Affrike, his retreate into Calabria, & the resolution which hee had taken neuer to shewe himselfe more in the world, for the shame of his misfortune and the punishment of his indiscretion, if the spirit of God had not inspired him with another will, and giuen him hope to make himselfe knowne for a King as he was borne. Hee sayd moreover that among so many soueraigne powers that were in the world, hee would not adresse himselfe to any, but to the State of Venice, to iudge of the truth of his condition. And to giue them better prooffe thereof, hee noted with great circumstances the Ambassadors which had bene sent from the Seigneury vnto him, the answers and dispatches they had carried backe, and the difficultes that were made. The Senat (who in all things but especially in matters of State proceeded warily and with great iudgement,) made a search of their relations, and found them conformable to that which hee had spoken of the Ambassadors that had bene sent to the King, D. Sebastian. Hee was wisely and iudiciously examined of the Estate of other affaires, wherevnto hee answered so boldly, as of some hee was held for the true King, D. Sebastian, and of others for a Magitian.

The King of Spaines Ambassador, maintayned in his Masters name, that hee was a counterfit and an Impostor, causing him to bee committed to prison: where they informed against him, who seeking to iustifie the resemblance of their bodies, they caused him to bee stript to see if the markes of his body were answerable to those that D. Sebastian had. They found seauenteene, whereof some might well bee made by art, the rest were by nature, as one hand longer then an other, and a great 1601. I am forced to goe where his commandement doth lead mee, and to shew my selfe for him, that his will is I should be. These words forced teares from him in speaking, and from them in hearing, who thinking to doe great seruice vnto God, and a great good vnto their Countrie, to saue their Kings head, and to set him in a place of safetie, they attire him like a frier of the order of S. Dominicke, and conduct him vnto Florence, to go more safely to Rome. The great Duke caused him to be apprehended, by the aduice of the Archbishop of Pisa, and in stead of sending him to the Pope, he deliuered him into the Viceroy of Naples hands: when he saw himselfe in the power of the Cassilians, and that the Duke had intelligence with them, hee reproched him with the breach of his faith, his royaltie, and the rights of hospitalitie. It is not commendable for a Prince to deliuer a suppliant into the hands of his aduerser party, hauing thrust himselfe vnder his protection. But the great Duke, seeing that the King of Spaine had a great Army, amazing all Italy, and threatening his Estates, he thought it good policy, not to incense a mighty King, and a poynt of wisdom to auoide the storme, and not to enter into War, the end whereof must needs be ruinous. He was conducted to the Viceroy of Naples, before whom he presented himselfe, with as assured a countenance, as he had done before the Senate of Venice and the Great Duke. Entering into the Hall, and comming towards the Viceroy (who either for the Reuerence of this action, or for the Disposition of the time, was bare-headed) he called vnto him a farre off; Earle of Lemos couer your Head. These words, deliuered with Grauity and Courage, amazed the Assistant. The Viceroy answered him presently, From whence haue you this power to command mee? It was borne with mee, replied the other; You seeme not to know mee, I know well who you are: remember that Don Philip King of Castille mine Vncle, sent you twise vnto mee. He discoursed so plainly and distinctly of that action, as hee left a great trouble in the Viceroyes minde, and a great opinion in the Assistants that he spake the truth. The Viceroy said vnto him, That he was a Counterfait. These words of contempt and insupportable injury to men of Courage, did so offend him, as he vied some bitter speeches against the Viceroy. But he could not free himselfe from the Castle D'Omo, where he continually cried out, to be carried into Portugal; That the People might see him, and that not onely Men, but Beasts and Stones, would take him for the true King, D. Sebastian of Portugal. Many held him for a Calabrois borne at Tauerne, and a Monke that had left his Order, other for Mark Tully Catizoni of Apulia. The Portugales (weare by his Life and Head. The prisoners which were in the same Castle & saw him euery morning at Masse, did note some tokens of a Prince, which made them say; That hee was the King D. Sebastian, or a Deuill. The best aduised, haue held him for an Impostor, the Ignorant for a Magitian, and the simple for a King. During the Viceroyes life, hee was not so rigorously intreated, but his Sonne succeeding him, he was more strictly garded. The 17. of Aprill 1602. a yeare after he had bene in the Cassilians hands, hee was commanded to answer presently without any further proceeding. To whom he said; That they tocke not a right course to Examine and Iudge his Processe. That they should present him vnto the Portugales, who had Nourished him, Knowne him, and Serued him: for all the Prooofe and Verification of his cause, depended vpon their Saying and Testimony: protesting, that if he liued a thousand yeares, he would neuer answer otherwise: and that if they were resolu'd to put him to death without anie other Order or Prooofe, hee tooke God for his onely Iudge (who knew the truth of his fact,) that hee was the right King D. Sebastian of Portugall, and that they might effect what they had formerly pretended to doe.

In the ende, they condemned him to be led ignominiously vpon an Ass, through the streetes of Naples, and to passe the rest of his life in the Gallies, the which was executed the last of Aprill, cutting off the hayre of his Head and Beard, and tying him to the Chayne, yet he was not forced to Rowe, but was intreated as a Gentleman of the Gallies. From Barellona the Gallies entred into the Ocean Sea, and came in August 1602. to S. Lucar of Barameda, where the Duke of Medina Sidonia, and his Wife desired to see him. Hauing long discoursed with him, the Portugales affirme,

The preterred King of Portugal fled by the Duke of Florence in January 1601. Conducted prisoner to Naples 23. of Aprill. 1601.

Hee is shut vp in the Castle da Omo.

Hee contemned to the Gallies.

At that hee whom they call their King, asked the Duke if he had the sword yet which hee had giuen him; when as he imbarked to passe into Barbary. The Duke answered, that in truth D. Sebastian King of Portugal had giuen him a sword at his imbarking, the which hee kept among others. Seeing then you haue it (replied their King,) I pray you send for it, for although it be foure and twentie yeares since I gaue it you, yet will I know it well. The Duke caused about a dozen to be brought, the which their King hauing wel vewed, sayd that it was not there, the Duke commanded that they should bring all the rest; and their King seeing it in his hands that brought them, sayd. Behold Duke the sword I gaue you when I past into Affrike. Then turning to his Cousin the Duke of Medina Sidonia wife, the which is daughter to the Prince of Eboly, after that hee had told her what speeches had passed in secret betwixt them when hee bid her fare well at Cadix, he sayd vnto her, I remember that I gaue you a Jewell, haue you it yet? The Duches answered that she had a Jewell which the King D. Sebastian had giuen her. Shew it me then said hee, I will know it well, and will shew you a secret which is yet yknowne vnto you. The Duches sent for it with many other Jewels, the which he knew from all the rest, saying, Behold the Jewell which I gaue you, and to proue my saying; cause the stone to be taken out, and you shal find my name, and my cipher grauen vnderneath it. There was in the Duches company a Negro whom their King knew, saying that she had washed his linnen when as he reigned in Portugal. They say, that when as the Duke saw so many apparent things approaching vnto truth, he admired them as miraculous, and retyred with a heauy countenance, as it were weeping for compassion, to see this miserable Prince in so wretched an estate. They say moreover, that many ancient Portugals of diuers conditions went to see him, and that al confesse & maintaine that it is the true Don Sebastian King of Portugal, who is now shut vp in the Castell of S. Lucar.

But ending the contrarieties of Spaniards and Portugals touching King Sebastian, we will say. That it is in the power of the King of Spaine to lay open the greatest & strongest deceit that euer was in the world, by a publike punishment of the Impostor: or being knowne to bee such as hee sayth, to rauish all the world with admiration. In the beginning of this yeare, the Court being quiet, and dreaming of nothing but of feasts and dancing, & the whole state in such tranquillitie, as nothing might seeme to interrupt it.

D The King had but one busines without the Realme wheron depended the cōtinent which he might giue to the Swisses, in confirming the promise which his Ambassador had made in renewing of their allyances. There had bin many Assemblies held to that end at Bade & Soleure, but all vncertaine as they be commonly. Their resolutions were inconstant and variable, with new demands, which did cut of nothing of the necessitie of the first. These diuerse agitations sprang from Milan & Sauoy, who could not endure to see the Flower de Luce flourish in the rocks and Alpes, and were greened to haue spent so many double Ducats in vaine, to choake the seedes of their affection to this Crowne. De Vie disposed things in as good sort as the King could desire, Brulart was sent to make the worke perfect. He gaue them to vnderstand the Kings last resolutions, with so great wisdom and dexteritie, as they were allowed by the greatest part of the Cantons. After that, the partisans of Spaine and Sauoy found that al their crosses brought more aduancement then difficultie to the Kings affaires, and that the most obstinate became temperate, and were forced to yeeld, & that they could not hinder, but that the light of vertue and the Kings fortune would shine through the Caos of their practises. Syllery finding that their wills were well prepared, and disposed to entertaine & accept of the Kings intentions, he made the proposition of renewing of the League at a Diet held in the Towne house of Soleure in September, in a very learned & elegant discourse. His discourse was very pleasing vnto the hearers, who thought that the allyance of France, with whom they neuer had any question, and whose friendship had not bin troubled with those feelings which the injuries of war do fixe deeply in the minds of men, was more profitable and necessary then that of other Princes, which haue hereditary deffains vpon that estate, who would cast lots againe, & come to a new diuifio.

These had sometimes sought to make ther profit of the diuersity of religion that is among France on the contrary side had alwaies exhorted them to liue in Peace, and not to vader-mine the foundation of their Estate the which consistes in Concord and Vnity. So Princes should alwaies desire that their Allies might liue in Vnion and Peace. This proposition of renewing the League with the King, was very acceptable vnto them all, but it troubled the small Catholike Cantons, who had made new Leagues with their neighbors, and desired that they would propound some meanes vnto them, that in contenting the King they might with Honour keepe their latter promises. The Ambassadors answered, that they must take those resolutions of themselves, whereby they might willingly contribute that which depended of them. It is no reason sayd the Ambassadors, that you should bee directed and set into the right way by vs, seeing you left it without vs and against vs. The Cantons sayd, that the friendship which they had sworne to France, was grounded vpon conditions, the which sayling, the duty of their allyance must also sayle.

Friendship grounded vpon profit is neuer durable, that of the Suisses cannot be otherwise vnited, they loue the Darigues more then Darius himselfe, and Glory to see the greatest Princes of Europe to purchase their friendship. Some aduised the King to leane the petty Cantons, and to take them as his enemies, seeing they had broken the League. But he thought he should wrong the reputation and dignity of his Crowne, if hee should loofe the friends which his Predecessors had gotten. And therefore his Ambassadors (although they seemed not to care for it) omitted nothing that might serue to reduce them into the right way, from the which, the opinion of profit, more then the force of friendship, had drawne them: thinking it reasonable to loue friends with their humors, not for the respect of the continuance of friendship, nor of their constancy, but for the Honour of this Crowne. They would not binde the Kings word to any other thing then the payment of a million of Gold in discharge of their debt or pension. There must be an other day, to deliuer that which should be resolved by euery Canton vpon the Kings offers and propositions. The petty Cantons appointed a Diet at Lucerna, to resolve of the difficulties they were in betwixt the alliances with France and Spaine, seeing they might not hold the one but they must abandon the other. Their resolution was to accept the renewing of the League, and to esteeme olde frindes for the best. Yet they did not publish it so soone, that it might be the better accepted: many daies were spent in Generall Assemblies at Baden and Soleurre, to reduce it to an inmutable point. Monsieur de Vic went vnto the Grisons, and procured an assembly to be called at Coire of the three Cantons and their Commons in their Episcopall City: Their were as many difficulties as the Country is rough, the Spanish practises had so much withdrawne their affections from France. They could not dissemble the grieffe they conceived for the confirmation of this League. The Count of Fuentes would not suffer any prouision to go out of the Dutchy of Milan, that the dert and comodity of victuels, might make the Grisons know that the friendship of Spaine was more profitable vnto them then that of France, and that they should not so much desire the number, as the profit of friends.

De Vic propounded the Kings intentions to 67. Ambassadors deputed by the three Cantons of the Grisons, and to as many other chosen out of the Country. They hold a great liberty of opinions in their Assemblies, euery man speakes what he thinks. Here they which made least shewe, spake loudest, in the end they resolved to accept of the renewing of the League, adding thereto such preiudiciall conditions, as two of them were sufficient to make the League fruitlesse for the King. De Vic sayd vnto them, that they must not thinke that the King would endure any addition or deminution in the ancient Treaty, answering the sayd Articles by writing, to the end that the Commons which were to determine thereon, might iudge that their reasons were not stronger then those which he had propounded vnto them, and their commodities and suerties greater with the Kings allyance, then withall others. While that De Vic was with the Grisons, Sillery labored to dispose the Cantons to the Kings will. But there was some

A something to resolve vpon. The Suisses although they haue not the quicknes of spirit as other nations, yet are they not lesse aduised in the conduct of their affaires. So as when the Kings Ambassadors thought that in the last Diet held at Soleurre, there would bee but one sitting, for that all difficulties had beene very exactly considered, they must yet haue patience for twelue dayes, with more Crosses and difficulties then were euer treated of in Suisseerland, for the like affaires; for both the Kings friends and enemies, had conspired not to consent to the conclusion of the Treaty, without assurance to be payd vnrasonable summes euery yeare, besides the million of Gold, that was granted. The stay of the bringing of the Kings money did also greatly distast them that should haue the best share in the distribution. The more certaine the hope is, the more trouble some is the stay. This sayling was insupportable vnto them, and thrust them into bad resolutions against the aduancement of the Kings affaires. So as the Ambassadors did think for a time they should get much, to breake with some, & to differ with others, rather then to tie the King vnto such forced conditions. But after much toyle of body and minde, the Treaty was concluded. There remayned nothing but to haue the Duke of Biron come, to authorise by his presence, what had bin concluded by the Kings Ambassadors: he came in the end of Iunuary, well accompanied and as well receiued by the Lords of that common weale, and by the Colonells and Captaines, to whom it seemed that they were in France, seeing him alwayes that had commanded ouer them in the Kings Army. The Duke spake vnto them in the General Assembly at Soleurre in this sort. Noble Lords, the King my Maister (making the same esteeme which his Predecessors haue done of your generosity, desiring the continuance of true friendship and faithfull allyance which hath bin of long time betwixt his Crowne and your Constancies) hath commanded me to come into your Country, for the happy ending of the Treaty which the Seigneours of Syllery and de Vic haue managed for the renewing of the League. His Maiesty hath also commanded mee to assure you of the account he makes of your Faith, and that he will fully obserue the promises that shalbe made vnto you. He doth also assure himselfe, that for your parts you will bring al willingnes & Freedome, now that his Realme is the most flourishing, giuing more cause of Enuy then of Pitty. He desires more earnestly to renewe the ancient alliances that haue bin betwixt the Kings and Crowne of France, & your Common weale, thinking that the good which shall rise thereby, shal be profitable vnto you, & the best and most assured meanes for to make you liue powerfully and happily. I will conceale how highly I esteeme the honour which the King my Master hath done me, in making choise of me with these Gentlemen, to serue for so Good and Holy a worke, and also to see my selfe with a Nation, which hath bin often (both in Peace and Warre) cherished & esteemed by my deceased Lord and Father, the Marshall Biron & of my selfe: For proofe of my Affection, I offer you all that is in my power, being desirous to assist you with all fauour, aed to serue you in that which a Knight of Honour ought & may. The Kings alliance was accepted by the Suisses, publike thanks were giuen to God, & the Duke with the Ambassadors solemnly feasted. The alliance which before had bin contracted but for the Kings life only, was concluded for the Daulphins also, after that of the Kings & as many yeares after as were granted to the deceased King. The King receiued great content to see this Treaty so happily concluded to the honor of his Crowne, contrary to the intent and practises of those that sought to hinder it. The Count of Fuentes greened that things had not succeeded according to his hope, cast his desseins in Italy vpon the Marquise of Final, without any pretext or offence, but onely vpon the presumption of his Masters greatness. To giue some colour to his attempt; he caused two diuers rumors to be spread abroad: One was, that the Marquis of Final was vpon termes to exchange this Marquise for a little Principality lying in the realme of Naples. The other was, that the Marquis of Final in the extremity of a sicknes had giue it to the King of Spaine. Vpon these two pretexts he caused Diego Pimentel his nephew, & Sancho de Luna to passe with a great number of Spaniards to surprize the place, & the Laniquenes that kept it; who were easily satisfied with a promise of 16 months pay surprized that 1602. that was due vnto them. He placed 200. Spaniards in it, vnder the command of D. A. Petro de Toledo, and presently resolved to fortifie the Port, and to put a Garrison therein. The chiefe end of his Conquest was to bridle the Genoueses, and to make their Trafficke with Spaine so discommodious, as they should reape no benefit, but what it pleased the Gouvernor of Finall. The Lord of the place, who had neuer any thought to Exchange, nor to giue it, filled the Popes and the Emperors eares, and all the Ayre with his Complaynts, but in the end finding no satisfaction, he was forced to allowe of that which pleased the stronger. The Spaniards made not so great an account of this purchase, as they conceiued hope of a great leauy of Men of Warre made in the Realme of Naples and Sicilia, and in the Duchies of Milan, Mantua, Modena, Fribin and Parma: whereof they ment to make an Army at Sea, greater and better conducted then the last. Many thought it was to repayre the fault of Alger, or to oppose against the desseignes of Cigala, who they said would come out off Constantinople with a hundred Sayle. As the desseigne was secret, so was it not knowne, who should bee the Generall. Andrew Doria demanded leauie of the King of Spaine, fore-seeing that they would hardy giue him the charge, for that they must neuer employ an unfortunate Generall twice. The Duke of Sauoy made shewe to accept of this command if it were offered him. They had greater enterprises in Europe, then in Affrick or Asia, although it were sayd, that the King of Fr had promised to make the King of Spaine Master of Alger. But the necessities of the Lowe Countries, and the practises they had in France, made the Spaniards to leaue all attempts against the Turkes and Moores C for this yeare, being so disapointed for want of money, as they were forced to flic to priuate purses, so as without an aduance of two hundred thousand Crownes by the Spinolas of Genoa, the Troupes which past in Aprill and May, had stayed vntill the end of the yeare in the Duchy of Milan.

These were the speeches of the King of Spaines desseignes, wherevnto they added that D'Albigny was gone to Milan to the Count of Fuentes; that the Marquis of Aix was in Spaine; that the Duke was ready to subiect himselfe wholly to the will of the Councell of Spaine, to whom he deliuered his two Sons, hauing made them Knights of his Order, to prepare them to the Voyage, and had sent Desfourny (an extraordinary Ambassador to Rome) to beseech the Pope to send them his blessing. But the King D knewe well, that vnder these shewes and Pretexts, there were other Negotiations to trouble his Estate, whereof he made no shew: yet such as did see him when hee was most free and priuate, discovered that his Head was troubled, and that the Toyle & Wearines of his Minde, was much more then that of his Body. One day comming from Hunting, being very pensue before the fire with his Hat on his Eyes, he drewe his Sword, speaking some words vnto himselfe, then he turned towards the Vidame of Chartres, who was there present, asking him when la Fin his Vncle would come, and that he longed to see him. At the same time there were great reparations made at the Battille, rather to keepe that fast, that was to be within it, then to resist without, which made many beleue, that the yeare should not passe, without lodging of some one of marke in the place. This Winter, the Court was full of Idolity and Sports, the E

Queene hauing made a very Rich and Sumptuous Maske, calling fiftene Princesses and Ladies of the Court vnto her, which represented sixteene Vertues, whereof the Queene made the first. The Duke of Vendosme being attired like Cupid, marched before the Queene: but within fewe dayes after he changed that Habite into Mourning, for the death of the Duke of Mercurie his Father in lawe, who dyed of a Pestilent Feauer on Twelue day in the City of Nurinberg, comming into France to prepare a greater expedition against the Turkes. The King was much grieued for his death; his funerals were made in Lorraine, and at our Ladyes Church in Paris, the whole Court of Parliament did assist, and Francis de Sala (elect Bishop of Geneua) made the Funerall Sermon. During the publike sports in Court, the Kings Councell laboured to end the lute betwixt the Commons (or third Estate) and the two first Orders of Dauphine. F

The Commons complayning, that all the Charges and publike oppressions, and all that

A that might be burthen some was layd vpon them, without any hope from the other E- 1602. states of the Prouince, although they made not the sixt part, being reasonable that all the charges being common, they should bee supported equally by all the Prouince (by her first condition) being declared free from all such charges, and with this freedome was giuen at the first to France. Euery order, pleaded for his owne liberties by the Deputies, the which the King hauing heard, he set downe a generall order touching the Taxes of Dauphiné, as you may reade at large in Pierre Mathewe.

The King hauing passed the feast of Easter at Fontainebleau, prepared to goe to Blois, to Tours and to Poitiers and farther, if the good of his presence so required. Many beleueed that his intent was to goe another way, which agreed well with their humours who breathed nothing but warre. The great leuies which were made in Italie: the Warlike humor of the Count of Fuentes: the great stirring of the Duke of Sauoy, who could not liue in Peace: the discontent of the Spaniards for the preiudiciall conditions of the Treaty of Peruins, and many other considerations, gaue some shew of the common opinion of Warre. The King also had some intelligence, that the Sea Army, prepared in the Realme of Naples, had an enterprise vpon Prouence, although the Spaniards gaue it out that it was for Agier, but the cleer-sighted knewe well that without some treason among the French, the Spaniards affaires were not in so good Estate, as to attempt any thing against France. The King was aduertised that the Duke of Biron, was strayed from his dutie, and assured moreouer that this disposition of his did not growe in an instant, & that he had not entred into these bad resolutions suddenly, if hee had not had conference with strangers. Hee could not beleue that a spirit so Vigilant, so Active and so Valiant, could suffer it selfe to be transported with such violent furies: and it seemed a dreame vnto him that a man which had gotten so much Honour, to whome his Father had left so much, and who had receiued daylie what hee would from the King, should resolute to that which was contrarie to his Honor and the greatnesse of his courage. This good opinion made the King not to beleue the aduice which was giuen him of his badde intentions, making no shew thereof, but that he would giue him the Godement of Guienne, and two hundred thousand Crownes recompence, with the Castells of Trimpette and Blaye, to D drawe him from the Frontier, which was more comodious for conference with them, who were resolved to withdrawe him from France, or to ruine him.

They had sought him after the taking of Lan, when as they descouered that hee was come to Paris in choller, for that the King had refused him some thing, where with hee gratified the Duchesse of Beaufort: then they offred him two hundred thousand Crownes yearely entertainment, and to bee Generall of all the Kings of Spaines forces in France. As they had found him an Achilles in battayle, so they found him an Ulysses to their words, stopping his eares at their Inchantments, saying, that choller should neuer drawe him from his dutie: that although his Nature were fire and boyling in the feeling and apprehension of a wrong, yet his heart would neuer suffer E this fire to consume the Faith and Loyalty, which hee ought vnto his Prince. Hee re- tained nothing of the offer which they made him, but onelie the remembrance of the esteeme which they made of his valour, and euen then hee suffred himselfe to bee carried away with those motions, which doe often transport the minde to insolency and contempt of all things, when they see themselves assured of ease, howe soeuer the chance fall, and that they shall neuer bee vnder the seruitude of necessity. He was some-times herd say, that hee would not die, before he had seene his head set vpon a quarter of a Crowne: that hee would rather goe to a Scaffold to loose his head, then to an Hospitall to begge his bread: that hee would die young, or haue meanes to doe his friends good. Esther Cesar or nothing. Either a free life or a glorious death, but hee had neither of them. His desseignes made him to utter words F of a Soueraigne, and so absolute, as the wife did impute it to extreame arrogancie, the which hath alwaies ruined them that entertaine it. It is a great happinesse for an Estate to haue great Captaines, but there is nothing so hard to entertaine, for when

The Duke of Biron's conspiracy discovered.

The Duke of Biron related the Government of Guienne.

He refused entertainment from the Spaniards.

He sayd hee would die a Soueraigne.

1602. as they thinke that they haue bound their Country vnto them, although all they doe bee lesse then their duties, they are easily discontented and like to Pausanias and The-mistocles speeke newe allyances and friendship from enemies, if they bee not rewarded to their owne wills, and to the heighth of their Ambition. The Duke of Biron had done great seruice to the King and Realme, so were his recompences so great, as no Nobleman of his quality in France, but might enuie him: For beeing not yet forty yeares olde, hee had enioyed the chiefeft dignities of the Realme. At fouretee-ne yeares hee was Colonell of the Swisses in Flanders. Soone after Marshall of the Campe, and then Marshall generall. Hee was receiued Admirall of France in the Parliamēt at Tours, and Marshall of France in that of Paris. Hee acknowledged none but the King at the sege of Amiens, and was his Maiesties Lieutenant Generall, although there were Princes of the bloud. To encrease his grearresse hee was declared a Peere of France, and his Barony erected into a Duchie. And yet not content with all this, hee sayd hee would not die but hee would straine higher. That hee will goe no more to recouer the Townes of Picardie, vnlesse the King set vpe his Image in brasse before the Louure, vsing still in his brauerie some very dangerous speeches, and with such affection, as hee was not pleased with them that did not applaude them.

He desires continuance of the Warre.

When hee sawe after the sege of Amiens, that Brittaine was reduced, and the Warre ended, hee thought that hauing no more vse of his valour, hee should haue no more credit. that hee should haue no more meanes to play the petty King, and to doe all that without feare which hee did without Iustice. Hee complaind of the King, and of the vnequall recompence of his Merits and Seruice. hee proclaymed his discontents, adding threats to his complaints, speaking of the King with so small respect, as his most passionate seruants held his speeches to bee insolent and dangerous. It was the defect of his Nature, but Fortune added something vnto that, for finding himselfe to abound with all the prosperities that a well ordered desire could wish for in his condition, he found that men loose themselves, beeing to much at their owne ease. The opinion of himselfe rayfed his thoughts so high, as hee valued himselfe at an inestimable price, thinking that his heart was not of the common temper of others: that there was no man liuyng that might equall him, and that none that were dead had atteyned to his meritts. And although that in all his life hee had shewed small zeale to religion, yet nowe when as hee prepared his heart to the motions of ambition, hee would seeme very religious, protesting that hee would bee an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestantes. La Noële Seigneur of La Fin, was (by reason of the troubles of Prouence and the quarrell of L'Escliqueres) retired to his house, beeing threatened by the King: in quarrell with some great personages of the Realme, and furcharged with debts and lures in Lawe. The discontented do still meete by appointment or by chance. The Duke of Biron (who knewe that hee had bene employed in the Duke of Alansons affaires, that since hee had negotiated with the Ministers of the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy, during the sege of Amiens, and that he had a heart full of discontent) imagined that hee sought a Master. They talke together, and mixt their griefes and passions in one complaint, they propound to seeke that without the Realme, which they could not finde within it, and to enter in practise with the Duke of Sauoye: they resolute to aduertise him of an intelligence which L'Escliqueres had vpon the fort of Barrault, the which he executed happily.

Hee discouers his discontent to La Fin.

Hee went into Flanders for the execution of the Treaty of Vernins, where Picoté of Orleans had conference with him, & inspired his heart with desires to raise his Fortune with those who both knewe and admired his meritts. The Duke of Biron heard him, and made no shewe to vnderstand him, and yet hee left him in an opinion that if he came into France hee would bee well pleased that hee should speake more plainly vnto him of that subiect. The Spaniards did beleue that hee yeelded, seeing hee gaue eare, and assured themselves eyther to winne him or to vndoe him. The King was aduertised by one, that was then employed in the Arch-dukes Court, of this

At this practise, but hee sent him word that the Marshall Biron was of too high a spirit to yeeld to so great a wickednes. Being returned out of Flanders, the King would haue married him, but he made shew that his affections were otherwise teled. And although he gaue it out, that he sought the daughter of Madame de Luce, yet hee treated to haue the other daughter of the Duke of Sauoy, whereof Cheualier Breton had spokenvnto him. La Fin had a promise from the Duke of Biron to doe all hee could to content his hopes. Picoté had made a voyage into Spaine, to receiue directions. Farges (a religious man of the order of Cisteaux) went into Sauoy, and so to Milan, to receiue order how to teare this plant from France, but the Duke of Sauoy being at Paris, pulled vp the Flower de Luce which was planted in his heart, & dislosed him so to trouble the King within the B realme, as he should leaue him the Marquitate of Saluces in peace. Vpon this assurance the Duke of Sauoy had no meaning to effect the Treatie of Peace; warre was proclaymed, the Duke of Biron takes the cheefe places of Bresse: Being at Pierre Chastell in the beginning of September, La Fin comes vnto him, who by his order had made two voyages to S. Claude, where Roncas was. The King had aduice thereof, but hee thought it better to dissemble these practises, then to surpriſe the best of his seruants in his actes of infidelitie. Hee was content to draw him into Sauoy, and to tell him that he must abandon La Fin, and not to giue eare to his bad perswasions. The King shewed him his error, to guide him into the right way, but as they which are posselt with this violent passion of desire to be Masters, are no more capable of gouernment nor Councell, hee conceiued that what the King spake for loue, proceeded from feare, continuing still his practises with La Fin, and neuer going to see the King, but with a great troupe. Hee made him beleue being at Annisy, that hee desired to discover some passage, and demanded guides of the Countie to that end, but it was onely to let Renazé passe to the Duke of Sauoy, to discover vnto him the estate of the Kings armie, and to make D'Albigny retyre with his troupes, the which without this aduice had bene cut in peeces.

Hee condemns the Kings aduice.

It was at the sametime when as the Duke of Biron intreated the King to giue the gouernment of the Cittadell of Bourg, to him that hee should name. The King answered him, that hee would commit that place vnto de Boiffes. This deniall did so transport the the Duke of Biron, and thrust him into such strange and diuulſh resolutions, as one morning being in his bed at Chaumont, he made an enterpriſe vpon the Kings person, whereof mention is made in the deposition of La Fin and Renazé, but it was not executed. He himselfe had horror of so execrable a thought. La Fin went also from the army to conclude the bargain with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes. Hee treated first with the Duke, and the Ambassador of Spaine at Turée, and then at Thurin with Roncas. Hee went to Milan to the Count of Fuentes, whether Picoté also came, bringing an answer from the Councel of Spaine, to the Duke of Birons propositions, and order to conferre with La Fin, and to perswade him to make a voyage into Spaine. Hee sayd openly, that the King of Spaine desired to haue the Duke of Biron, at what price and peril soeuer. The Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes appointed a day to meet at Some, with the Ambassador of Spaine, La Fin and Picoté. There their minds were knowne, and all difficulties freed of either side. La Fin who had peered into the seacret of his Councells, sayd, that the marriage of the Duke of Sauoyes third daughter, was the Cymment to ioyn together and vntie all this Treatie, with promise of fiew hundred thousand Crownes, and the transport of all the rights of the Soueraigntie of Bourgogne. The Duke of Sauoy gaue him more hope, then assurance of this marriage, and it was not credible that hee would accept of a meane gentleman for his Sonne in Law, who was not of soe great a house, but there were many better then his in France. Princes promise all, and hold nothing but what doth not prejudice their greatnesse. Whilſt that La Fin treated of the Duke of Birons capitulation in Italie, the Treatie of Peace at Lions was concluded. The ignorant sayd that the King had done ill in not proceeding, and

A These were discourtes or men which did not consider, how dangerous it is to goe farre from the frontier, and to leaue behind his backe a strong conspiracie: without this peace the King had bene forced to passe the Alpes, the which had bene a fauorable occasion for this Treason. He was aduertised of the bad seruices the Duke of Biron did him: and that the enterprises which hee had vpon the Cittadell of Thurin, and the best places of Piedmont, were discovered by their treacherie, to whome hee had trusted his Crowne and Scepter. A Prince that hath Traitors in his armie, neuer fights happely. Charlemagne repented his trust reposed in Ganelon, and Charles Duke of Bourgonne in Campobaccio.

The Duke of Biron craues pardon of the King,

The Duke of Biron had alwaies dissuaded this peace. But finding that this peace must send him home to his gouernment, & that the King had some notice of his practises with La Fin, hee seemed to bee verie penitent, and asked pardon of the King, walking in the Cloyster of the Franciscane friars at Lions, beseeching him, (with a countenance full of contrition and humilitie) to forget his bad intentions, the which rage and dispiht for the Cittadell of Bourg had possessed his heart with. The King pardoned him. Saying that he was well pleased, that hee had relyed vpon his clemencie, and the loue which hee bare him, whereof hee would alwaies giue him so good proofs, as hee should haue no cause to doubt, nor to attempt anything against the assurance he had of his loyaltie. Going from thence, hee met with the Duke of Espenon, saying, (that as to his best friend) hee would impart vnto him, the best aduerture that euer happened vnto him, hauing discharged his conscience from the terrors and horrors that did afflicke him, and that the King had pardoned what was past, and had promised him all fauour hereafter. The Duke of Espenon answered, that he was glad, but he must craue an abolishment: for offences of that qualitie are not so easily remitted. How should I, sayd hee, assure my selfe, better then in the Kings word? If the Duke of Biron must sue for an abolishment, what must others do? The Duke of Espenon had reason to aduise him to take an abolishment, & the other was in no error in trusting to the Kings word, who had forgotten his fault, if hee had done nothing since to renew the remembrance. But here they obserued an act which had all the signes of an implacable harred. The Duke of Biron being sent for by the King, to come and receiue his commandements, and the testimonie of his clemencie, parts from Bourg, and comes to lye at Vimie. There hee made a dispatch to La Fin, who was at Milan. Hee goes to Lions, and is receiued of the King, as the Father doth his lost Child, whome hee hath found againe. Hee stayed some dayes at Lions, and hauing accompanied the Queene at her departure, hee returned to Vimie, where hee made another dispatch to La Fin by one Farges. As soone as he comes to Bourg, hee sends away Bosco (Cousin to Roncas) to aduance the business. This negotiation was continued at Seme, betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count of Fuentes, and La Fin. The Count of Fuentes led La Fin to Milan, desiring to bee satisfied of some points, but finding his answeres not constant, he thought it not fit to trust the secret vnto him, but to dispatch him: who finding that he was vnpleasing vnto the King in this negotiation, stayed not long there. Hereupon he sent him backe, & requested him to passe by the Duke. But he did wel in taking his way by the Grisons, to recouer Basill, Paurentin, & Besancon, for Renaze his Secretarie, who passed into Sauoy was stayed prisoner. The worke changed nothing but the instrument. Alphonso, Casal, & Roncas continued it with the Baron of Lux. In the meane time the Duke of Biron slept not, hauing sent a man into Spaine, although he were neere vnto the King, who for that he would not loose him, kept him about him, hee carried him to the frontier, and sent him into England, where he heard of the death of the Earle of Essex. A fresh example of Iustice against those that seeke to be feared of their masters, and abuse their loue. At his returne he made a voyage into Gascone, wher he was honored of the Nobility as a Prince, and being returned to Dijon, he went into Suisse, to conclude the renewing of the Kings Alliance, where he continued his practises with the Count of Fuentes, to whom he sent his Secretary, vnder colour to condukt his Pages to Nona Palma, a Fort of the Venetians. Being returned

He continues the offence pardoned.

Renaze stayed prisoner by the Duke of Sauoy command.

A out of Suisse, he went not to giue an account of his charge, excusing himselfe vpon the holding of Estates of the Prouince. The King who had some inkling of these broiles, (by Combellies) desired greatly to speake with La Fin, to be informed of the truth. La Fin who had his heart big with dispiht, that the Baron of Lux would haue all the frute of of this negotiation, and that Renaze was detained prisoner in Sauoy, sent Cerezat to the Duke of Biron, to tell him that he could no longer be his seruant, if hee did not deliuer him Renaze, aduertising him also that hee could no longer deferre his going vnto the King, and that he desired to know what he would haue him say, touching things past. He made small account of one of his propositions, and spake of Renaze as if he were no more among the liuing. Touching the other he sayd to Cerezat, that he was of opinion he should goe to the Court with a small traine, and that he should prepare himselfe at the first, to receiue words of choller and contempt from the King, the which hee should easily calme, in beseeching him to beleue, that the voyage which he had made into Italy, was onely for deuotion to our Lady of Loretto, and that passing by Milan and Thurin, they had charged him to propound the marriage of the Duke of Sauoyes thirde daughter vnto him, which he would not harken unto, seeing his Maiestie would take the care to marrie him. He intreated and aduised Cerezat, to aduise La Fin, to dissuade all those that had made the voyages with him, especially of a Curat, and to lay his papers in some place of safetie, if he would not burne them, and to consider in the end, that he had in his hands, his Life, his Fortune, and his Honor. La Fin came to the Court at Fontainebleau in the end of Lent, he spake first with the King, and with Villeroy alone, he had conference with the Chancellor in the night, with Rhosni in the forest, and with Sillery at the pressing place. All had horror to see the writings, and to heare the desseins which they vnderstood. We must not beleue lightly: for slander is subtill & doth seeke to supplant the most innocent actions. But when the preseruatiō of the State is in question, the most doubtfull things are not to bee reiecte nor contemned. The King could hardly beleue so great a wickednes: the facilitie of his bountie made him hard of beleefe. La Fin made him to see such apparent and certaine proofs of this conspiracie, as he was forced to beleue more then he desired. Hee declared all that had past in his voyages to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuentes, for the Duke of Biron. Saying that hee desired, that the returne of the warre might haue troubled his Maiestie, and profited them that were the cause of it. But seeing that his sacred and inuolable person was not excepted, and that they made cruell desseins against him, he had such horror, as he was resoluēd to giue him intelligence thereof, choosing rather to faile in his promise to the Seruant, then in his dutie to the Master. The King full of clemencie and bountie, was wonderfully greeued to see so vnnatural a conspiracie: Yet he sayd, that if the Conspirators did their duties, and gaue him the meanes they might to prevent the bad desseins of his enemies, he would pardon them. If they wepe said he, I wil weepe with them. If they remember what they owe me, I will not forget what is due to them. They shall find me as full of clemencie, as they are voyd of good affection. I would not haue the Marshall Biron the first example of the seueritie of my Iustice, and that he should be the cause that my raigne (which hitherto hath bene like vnto a calme and cleere skie) should be suddenly ouercast with clouds of thunder & lightning. And from that time his resoluēd was, that if the Marshall Biron confessed the truth, he would pardon him. His Councell were of that opinion, so as he would imploy himselfe effectually, to doe as much good for the seruice of his estate against his enemies, as he had practised it among them. Of many papers which La Fin presented vnto the King, they made choise of 27. peeces: which were not those which concluded most against the Duke of Biron, but which made mention onely of him, the King being vnwilling to haue the rest discovered, to the end that the punishment of one, might serue for an example to all. The Chancellor kept these papers with such care, as he caused them to be locked vnto his diblet, being loth to trust any one with them, or shew them till need required. The Baron of Lux was at Fontainebleau when as La Fin arrived, the King sayd vnto him that hee was very well satisfied, that La Fin had spoken so honorably, and so wisely Hee returned to Dijon well content, thinking that all things were found. La Fin writes to the Duke of Biron, that he had satisfied the King of his actions, and hath sayd nothing but what he thought might serue to banish all bad impressions. The King managed the busines so wisely, as the euent was happy, making shewe to feare no enemies but abroad. He grew eiealous at the arming of so many Gallies at Genoa for the King of Spain, vnder collour of the Prince of Piedmonts passage, least they should haue some enterprise vpon Prouence. He therefore commanded the Dukes of Guise and Pantadour, to be carefull of their charges. He writ to the Couernor of Lions (whose intent was to spend some part of the Sommer at Chaumont) to returne to Lions, for that hee was aduertised from all partes that his enemies had some desseigne there, whereof they wanted. Hee commanded Lesdigueres to goe to Horfe-backe if neede were, and when the Gouvernour of Lions should send for him; And he caused the Marquis of Spinolas troups to bee obserued, the which were readie to passe at Pont de Grefin to goe into Flanders, the which in truth were but to couer the Duke of Birons practises.

The King
goes to Blois.

The flure is two shillings.

The King parted from Fontainbleau to go to Blois and so into Poitou. There are alwaies in Strates (as in great bod es) swellings and bad humors, which are not to be cured by violent remedies, but gently, and by the Princes presence. There were in Guienne and Poitou, diuers motions, which could not bee dispersed but by the light of the King. He resolved to go into those quarters and to shewe himselfe vnto them Glorious in Peace, who had neuer seene him but Triumphant in Warre. He past to Blois, Tours, and then to Poitiers. His presence did pacifie all Mutinies, which grew by reason of the imposition of a Soule vpon the Liure, and through the apprehension which was giuen the People, that he would giue Garrisons to some Townes, and Citadells to others, and to all in generall an increase of their miseries. But as soone as the King had said vnto them, that he came not to see them and ruine them, but to releue them. That he would build no other Fortresses but in their Hearts, nor vnto any more constraints to succour the necessities of the Crowne, then their own good will: That he desired more to ad and increase, then to take away or diminish their contents: And that hee would not haue the gold of his treasure to bee bathed in the teares and blood of his subiects: there was no man but did blesse the yeares of his raigne, and did wish it immortal. His presence did also disapoint many badde practises, which were growing. France was so full of badde humors, as vpon the least motion that came from abroad, it was readie to fall into her former Phrensies.

The great trouble of the Pallace at Paris, by the intermission of hearing of causes, and the dismission of Solyciters, (the which happened the twelfth of May, a fatall moneth for the Parisians by a greater reuolt) seemed to preface some newe storme. The cause grew from a decree of the Court, giuen against Solyciters, and by the Kings authority and expresse commandement, who before hee parted from Paris to passe the Easter at Fontainbleau, sent for the cheefe of the Court of Parliament and of all the other Courtes, to recommend their charges vnto them. From whose owne mouth they vnderstoode, howe much hee desired that all the Iustice might bee administrated with lesse charge, and lesse losse of time. That there was no Iustice for them that had no money; so excessive were the Iudges Spices and the Solyciters fees. The Court of Parliament desiring that according to the Kings minde, intention and last commaunde the excessive (whereof they complained) against the Solyciters, might bee reduced to a meane and iust temper, assembled to redresse those disorders. The opinions beeing heard and numbred, against Aduocates, the first President sheweing that a reformation was as necessary in Iudges as in Solyciters. In the ende a decree was made, by the which it was ordeyned and appointed, that euer Solyciter should set downe vnder his hande, in the ende of his writtings, what hee had taken for his owne

A owne fees, to the ende that in case of excesse, it might bee moderated, when as the Court should proceede to iudgement of the proceffe. Moreover they should giue a certificate what they had taken for the pleading of causes, to be set downe in the rate of charges, all vpon paine of extortion. The Law was not made against the good, but onely to restrain the auarice of others, who preferre the oportunitie of taking, before all reprehension. All notwithstanding did oppose themselves against the execution of this Law, saying, that they would rather leaue their places, then subiect themselves to the rigour of the Decree, and do so great a wrong to the Dignity and Liberty of their profession.

The Court made an other Law, whereby it was decreed, that such as would not pleade, should deliuer their names vnto the Register, after the which they were forbidden to practise as Solyciters, vpon paine of falshood. This second decree was pronounced in open Assembly in the house of the Kings Attornie generall. The next day there went out of the Chambers of Consultation, by two and two, to the number of three hundred and seuen, they past through the Pallace hall, went to the Register to giue vp their hoods, and to declare that they obeyed the second decree, seeing they could not obey the first. From that time the Pallace was without pleading, the Solyciters being busied to defend themselves, setting downe all the reasons they could for their iustification: yet could they not moue the Court to reuoke or change the Decree: they were forced to haue recourse vnto the King, who to reconcile this diuision, which happened vpon a day, which renewed the memorie of a greater trouble, hee sent his letters to the Parliament in tearmes conformable to his Iustice, and the wisdom of his Councell. By the which it was lawfull for Solyciters to exercise their functions as they had done before the sayd Decree, inioyning them notwithstanding to obserue the ordinance made at Blois in that behalfe in the 161. Article. The parties which had sutes did languish in expectation of this declaration. As they complained of the corruption, so they suffered the inconueniencie of the remedie.

The Court which had made many iust and seuerer Lawes against Combats, confirmed the Edict which the King made at Blois. Before his Maesties departure from Fontainbleau, hee had commanded the Constable, Chancellor, Marshalls of France, and the cheefe of his Councell, to deuise some meanes to suppress the libertie of Combats, being so iniurious and preiudiciall to his estate. By their aduise an Edict was made, by the which they that call, or are called, or which assist, or seconds him that calls, or is called, are declared guiltie of high Treason, and to bee punished according to the rigour of the Lawes. Commanding the Constable, Marshalls of France, Gouvernours, and Lieutenants generall of Prouinces, to prevent Combats, and to forbid them vpon paine of death to iudge absoulutely, as they shall thinke good, of all that concerns the reparation of wronges, and to force them that are condemned, to satisfie by imprisonment. The King effected his busines happily in Poitou: hee found so great an obedience and affection in them to please him, as hee remained very well satisfied. His Maestie left so many testimonies in all places, of his bounty, as all had cause to prayse him, and to blame their practises which sought to trouble the peace. The Duke of Biron did not thinke the King should haue found so great obedience and loue, among his subiects of that Prouince. He had sent some of his seruants to Court, to learne how the market went, and to shew the discontent hee had for the iealousie which was conceiued of his Faith, and Dutie. The King who was well informed of his intelligences with the Count of Fuentes, resolved to see him, and to keepe him from his enemies. Hee sent Descares vnto him, with charge to say, that hauing intelligence of the great Leuies of souldiars made in Italie, hee had resolved to maintain the body of an army vpon the fröter, & to giue the charge vnto him, and to that end hee had commanded De Vrie his Ambassador in Swisse, to demand a speedy leuy of 6000. men, & to cause the to march wher he should haue directiōs: that there in hee followed the Councell of the Constable his gossip, whose aduice hee sent him

He stirres not for al that, excusing himselfe sometimes vpon the holding of the Estates: sometimes that the enemy being so neere, it were an act vnworthy of his reputation to turne his backe & abandon the Frontier. The King sent the President Ianin, a man pow-erfull in perswasion, who comming to Dijon, gaue the Duke to vnderstand howe much the King desired to see him, and how necessary this sight was, and among many discourses (applied slyly to his humour) hee let him knowe the Kings strength and the length of his Arme. This was not able to moue him. He considered that the Duke of Biron must bee perswaded to this voyage, by him that was all of his Councell, & home he assured that as he should haue all the Honour of this perswasion, so he could expect nothing but disgrace and ruine of a contrary councell. His friends notwithstanding 3 did conuare him not to come, one of his best friends sent him word by his Brother, that his Gouvernement was disposed of, and that for his last hope he aduised him to retire to the Tranche Comté. An other friend sent him worde that hee should distrust all he saue, and all that should bee sayd vnto him to moue him to come: that the Kings letters were Golden pilles: that la Fins assurances were but deceites, and to consider that the voyage which the Vidame of Chartres had made to Antun (to assure him that his Vncle had sayd nothing) was made at the Kings charge. But an other friend sent him a contrary aduice to come, and that his onely presence would disperse all these bad reports. There was danger in either. The King sware hee would go fetch him. He should haue seene him selte beseeged with the Kings forces, and farre from the strangers, which had charge to passe into Flanders. In going, the foulness of his offence could giue him no hope of returne. He takes that aduice which he thinkes lesse perilous, & nothing doth so much aduance the execution, as the assurance he takes of that which la Fin had written vnto him, whom hee sees returned to his house contented, and freed from all distrust. So the Duke promiseth to come vnto the King about the midest of Iune, to some of his houses neere vnto Paris. It was a signe of distrust which the King dissembled, as being indifferent vnto him. The President Ianin goes before, & the Duke of Biron, with Desfures followe after by easie iorneyes. Vpon the way hee had an aduice sent him to come no further, and being at Montargis hee was in great restience, but hee had so great a confidence of himselfe, and of the opinion which all the Court had of his valour, as hee did not beleue there was any man so hardy as to laie hold of him, and that if he might haue but meanes to drawe his sword, hee would free himselfe from his enemies. Hee flattered himselfe in his vanity, and pleased himselfe as Pigmalion did in his Image, and Narcissus in his shadowe. The Councell which they gaue him to humble himselfe vnto the King, was the last Anchor of his helth. He found no man that spake for his pride, but euery man would haue sayd for his humility. But his courage was too great to stoope. Presumption had filled his eares with so much vanity as the voice of Truth could not enter. Many reasons were giuen to stay him in his iorney. But it is impossible to auoide the prouidence of Heauen. The Duke of Biron wil needes carry his head to the Kings Iustice. The discours of Reason, or the iudge-ments of Truth preuaile not with a spirit transported with passions. There were many badde presages of the Dukes voyage. A Ducke came into his Cabinet and no man knewe howe, hee commanded it should bee carefully kept, but as soone as hee was parted it died. Presently after the Horse which the Arch-duke gaue him called Pastrana, fell madde and killed himselfe. The like happened to a Horse which he had from the great Duke. An other Horse which the Duke of Lorraine gaue him, pined to death.

He came to Fontainebleau, when as they had no more hope of his comming, and the King had resolved within two or three daies after to go into Bourgogne. His Maiesty walking in the great garden about sixe of the clocke in the morning, was herd say vnto the Lord of Souray. He will not come. He had scarce spoken these words, but he sees him enter with seauen or eight with him. The King sayd, he comes slyly to conduct him to his house. Hee aduanceth and makes three great courties a good distance off.
The

A The King embraced him and sayd; That he was come in good time to conduct him to his House, which words were diuersly vnderstood by the hearers. The first wordes he had vnto the King, was vpon the occasion of his comming, beginning to excuse his long stay. The King gaue eare to fewe words, but tooke him by the Hand, to walke and to shew him the plot of his building. Passing from one Garden to another, the Duke of Espernon saluting the Duke of Biron, told him in his eare, that in comming he had giuen more credit to his owne Courage, then to the counsell of his Friends. In all the discourse which he had with the King, as there appeared Coldnes in the countenance of the one, so there was some signe of Perturbation in the others words. The King talked vnto him of the bad course he had taken, the which had no other issue, then Ruine, Repentance and Dispayre. The Duke of Biron answered, That hee was not come yther to Iustifie himselfe, or to demand Pardon, or to accuse his Friends. He let scape many other Words, which his Maiesties presence and the Lawe of Duty should haue restrayned. Dinner time being come, he desired to dine with the Duke of Espernon, for that his own Traine was not yet come. After Dinner they came to see the King, who hauing walked a litle in the Hall, retired into his Cabinet, commanding two or three to enter, and sayd nothing to the Duke of Biron, who stayd at the corner of the Bed towards the Chayre, obseruing that he was not respected as he had wont to be, & that he was no more in Opinton and Admiration as he had bin. The Marquis of Rhefisy entered into the Cabinet, & hauing staid there almost halfe an hower, he came forth and saluted the Duke of Biron, telling him, that the King asked for him. There he was perswaded not to conceale that which time could not long keepe hidden, & whereof the King was to well informed; that what he desired to knowe from the Dukes owne mouth, was but to let him see, that none but himselfe should haue knowledge thereof. The Duke of Biron (who thought that la Fin had not discovered any thing) continued stil firme, vp-on the protestations of his innocency, beseeching the King to do him Iustice against the that sought to oppresse him by Slanders; insupportable to the Conscience so cleare as his was, or to suffer him to take his reuenge by the Sword. The King led him to the Tennis-court: hee would make the match, saying; That the Duke of Espernon and hee, would play against his Maiesty and the Count of Soissons. The Duke of Espernon answered presently; You play well, but you make your matches ill. At night he supped with the Lord Steward. It appeared he was not content. He ate nothing, no man spake to him, and they held him for a man abandoned to misfortune. Yet he thought no man would lay hand on him, trusting too much in his own courage. The King in the meane time walked in his chamber, deuising of some great resolutiō, he was heard speak these words He must bend or breake. He gaue him time to take counsell of his Conscience, & to eu-aporate those bad humors which did choake him. The night past so quietly as many thought it would be, but a Thunderclap, which made a great noise, & did little harme; that the King would rest iustified to haue discovered the Treason, and taken all meanes from the Traytors to hurt him, not being conuenient to discouer all the conspirators.
E He commanded the Count of Soissons to go to the Duke of Biron, & to do what he could to dissolue the hardnes of his Heart, & to draw the truth from him: he goes vnto him, he coniuers & adiuers him, to think of that which he thought least of, to humble himselfe, and to feare the Lions pawe, & the indignation of a King. The Duke of Biron answered, That the King could not complaine but of the good seruices he had done him, & that he had great reason to complaine that he suspected his Loyalty, hauing giuen him so many proofs.
The Count of Soissons hauing obserued his humor, & what litle frute might be drawne from his obdurate Heart, by any more perswasions, who beleued that the King had sent him to draw something from him, he left him. Early the next morning the King walking in the litle Garden, he sent for the Duke of Biron, and talked long with him, thinking to reclaime him, & to giue him meanes to free himselfe from the mischief into the which he did run headlong by his wilfulness. He continued long bare-headed, lifting his eyes vp to heauen, beating his Breast, & making great protestations to maintaine his innocency. There appeared choller in the Kings countenance, & by the Duke of Biron's behauiour there seemed fire in his words.

From thence the Duke went to dinner, by the way he met one with a Letter which A aduised him to retire himselfe: he shewed it to the Capitaine of his Gard, who wished that he had bene stabd with a Dagger so as he had not come. He mocked at all them which foretold his fall, and seemed alwayes hardy and bold in his answers. The King heard his braueries coldly, but not able to apply himselfe to dissemble, which is held a new vertue in Princes, he still cast out some words of the bad estate into the which his wilfulness would bring him. The King was much troubled in minde before he could resolve: the Lords of Villeroy, Sillery and Genre went and came often, before they could vnderstand wherunto it tended. Many thought it was to shorten the course of Iustice, in so apparent a crime, and begin with the execution, dealing with the Duke of Biron as Alexander did with Parmenio, for Princes are Masters of the Lawes, they haue one forme of Iustice for great men, and another for those whose quality requires B not so great respect. In these accidents there is no difference whether bloud be drawn before or after dinner; Necessary teacheth the disorder, and the Profit doth recompence the example, so as the Estate be preserved by the death of him that is preuen-ted. But the King will none of that. He proceedes with more Courage and Generosity: These examples of Execution had bene blamed in his Predecessors, he will haue his Subiects, and all the World to know, that he hath power and authority sufficient to roote out by the forme of Iustice, not the Authors of such a Conspiracie, for they be Devils, but the Complices and the instruments how terrible soeuer. He will haue the Solemnities and lawfull Ceremonies obserued, and that they be iudged by the C rigour of the Lawes.

The resolution was taken to apprehend him, & in like sort to seize vpon the Count of Auvergne. The King would not haue them taken in the Castle, but in their Lodgings. The Duke of Biron who had some doubt thereof, and who was prepared for that which he could not fore-see nor preuent, thought that hee needed not to feare any thing in the Kings Chamber, and that all the danger were at the going forth; and therefore he provided himselfe of a short Sword, with the which he presumed to make his passage. They gaue the King to vnderstand, that if he were apprehended in any other place, it must needs be bloody: that to auoide an inconuenience, it was good to passe ouer respects that were more Vaine then necessary. The King walking in the Gallery, called for Vitry and Pralin, and gaue them order how he would haue his commandments executed, and then he called for his supper. The Duke of Biron supped at Montignys Lodging, where he spake more proudly and vainly then euer, of his owne Merits, and of the friends he had gotten in Suisse. Then he fel to commend the deceased King of Spaine, his Piety, Iustice and Liberality. Montigny stayed him sodainly, saying, That the greatest commendation they could giue vnto his memory, was to haue put his owne Sonne to death for that he had attempted to trouble his Estates. This speech brake off the Duke of Birons discourse, who answered but with his eyes, and thought of it with some little amazement. After Supper the Count of Auvergne and the Duke of Biron came to the King, who walked in the Garden. They were well accompanied, intending to haue gone with a lesse Trayne. It was sayd the Dukes Horses were fad-led ready to be gone, and that he had asked leaue in the Morning. The King hauing done walking, inquired the Duke of Biron to play; they entred into the Queenes Chaber. The Count of Auvergne passing by the Duke at the entry of the Doore, sayd vnto him in his eare, We are vndon. There played at Primero, the Queene, the Duke of Biron (vpon whom all the mischeefe must fall,) and two others. The King played at Chesse, and in playing did acte the part of Vlisses, going and coming to giue order to his affayres. It appeared that his Spirit was troubled with a waighty action. He entered into his Cabiner, being perplexed with two contrary Passions, doubtfull where-vnto he should yeeld. The Loue which he had borne to the Duke of Biron, the knowledge he had of his Valour, and the remembrance of his seruices, made him to reiect F all thoughts of Iustice, and to intreat him, as Licurgus had done him that put out his Eye. On the other side, feare of trouble in his Estate, and the apprehension of the which preferred the priuate before the publike. He praied vnto God to assist him with his holy Spirit, to pacifie the Combat which he felt in his soule, and to fortessie him with a holy resolution, to that which should be for the good of his People, ouer whom he commanded by his onely Grace. His praier being ended, all difficulties which troubled him were dispersed, and he fully resolved to deliuer the Duke of Biron into the hands of Iustice, if he might not otherwise draw the truth from him of his bad attempts.

They continued play still, the King taking the Queenes place sometimes, attending the end of his resolutions. The Count of Auvergne was rettyred, The King sent for him, and walked vp & down the chamber whilest the Duke of Biron dreimpt of nothing but his Game. Varennes Lieutenant of his Company, making a shewe to take vp his Cloake, told him in his eare, That he was vndon. This word troubled him so, as he neglected his Game. The Queene obserued it and told him, That he had misreckoned himselfe to his owne lesse: The King said; That they had plaied ynough, commanding euery man to retire. He entred into his Cabiner, & commanded the Duke of Biron to enter with him, whose Health or Ruine depended vpon an answer pleasing to his Maiesty.
Who willed him once for all to declare what he had done with the Duke of Sauoy, & the Count of Fuentes, and that he should assure himselfe, his Clemency should be grea-

D The Duke of Biron was forced to suffer them to take it from him, and in deliuering it, he cast his eyes about him, to see if hee could seize vpon some other, but they had preuented him. When as he sawe all the Gard placed in order in the Gallieye, hee thought they would haue slaine him, and demanded something in his hand, That he might haue the Honour to die in defending himselfe, and some little time to praye vnto God. They answered him; That there was not any man would offend him, that they had no other charge from the King, but to conduct him to his lodging. You see (said he in passing,) how they intreat good Catholikes. Hee was conducted to the Cabinet of Armes, whereas he neither slept, nor layed downe. Pralin went to the Count of Auvergne, declared vnto him the Kings Commandment, and deman-E ded his Sword; Hold, take it said the Count, it hath neuer killed any but wilde Bores, The Count are quenched with the Waxe which did nourish them and giue them light. And as if all the Dukes power had bene in his Sword, as soone as he had deliuered it, he remayned as a Body without a Soule, and was in a moment deprived of all that which Galba held most precious among Men; Fayth, Liberty, and Friendshipp.

There came no word out off his Mouth but did offend God or the King. Hee suffered himselfe to bee carried away with extreame impatience. The foresight of miserie which doth moderate it in others, made it insupportable to him, cursing himselfe and his Indiscretion, in that hee had not beleued his good friends, who advised him to make his Peace a farre off. This Choller in effect was not much vnlike vnto a Madde man, but in the countenance. for sodainly he reclaimed himselfe and considered that all his Cries and Words were not of force to saue him.

Presently

1602. Presently Dispatches were made to all the Princes and Potentats of Christendome, to Gouvernors of Prouinces and to Ambassadors, who were amazed at this accident, as of a most odious conspiracy, by a person that was so much obliged. Those which favoured it, gaue out false brutes in Italy, that it was a blowe giuen to Religion, to weaken it in the ruine of him who said that he desired no more glorious Title, then to be furnished The Source of the Huguenots. That it was an aduice from England to breake the Iuelins one after another. The King would haue these false impressions made cleare by the light of truth, euen whereas the passion of his Enemies did seeke to obscure it. One wryting out off the Realme vpon this subiect, said; That it was no question of Religion, but to dismember the Crowne, and to diuide it at the discretion of the Council of Spaine, and the Duke of Sauoy, rooting out the King and his Race. It may bee the Authors and Vndertakers would haue bene troubled in the execution of their desseigne, although we had not prevented them, as now we haue. But it was the end wherunto they aspired. The names of many haue bene drawn in vnkowne to them, the which the Kings Justice might well discerne and veresie: you must not be moued with the bruits which fly abroad, but beleue what I write vnto you, for it is the very truth. The next day about Dinner-time, the Duke of Biron sent to tell his Maiesty; That if he tooke not order for Burgundy was lost, for that as soone as the Baron of Lux, should heare of his Imprisonment he would vndoubtedly deliuer Dijon, and Beaune vnto the Spaniard. These words did greatly offend the King, who said; Behold the Boldnesse and impudency of the Marshall Biron, who sends me word, that Burgundy is lost, if I take not order, and that the Barron of Lux will draw in the Spaniard when he shall heare of his imprisonment. His Obstinacy hath vndone him, if he would haue told me the truth of one thing whereof I haue prooffe by his owne hand writing, he should not be where he is; I would I had payd two hundred thousand Crowns, that he had giuen me meanes to pardon him. I neuer loued any so much as him. I would haue committed my Son and Realme into his hands. He hath done mee good seruice, yet he cannot deny but I haue thrice saued his life. I drewe him out off the enemies hands at Fontaine-Francoise, so wounded, and so amazed with blowes, that as I played the Souldiar to saue him, I also plaid the Marshall to make the Retreat, for he told mee that he was not then in case to do it, nor to serue mee. The King attended not this aduertisement from the Duke of Biron, for he had already sent the Marshall Lauardin to settle his authority in that Prouince, with a resolution to march in person if there were neede. His enemies were not without feare, doubting that he would proceed farther, nothing being so much to be feared as an enemy that hath alwayes vanquished. About fiftene daies before Fourg l'Aspinasse receiued a Commission to raise a regiment of ten companies, and Nereftan had the like to supply his. The order was to send them into Prouence, but necessity had drawne them into Bourgongne with two regiments of Suisses, vnder the commandes of the Colonells, Galaty and Heyd, and a great quantity of Artillery drawn out of the Arcenal of Paris, & that of Lions, if all the Country had not presently yeelded obedience to their Prince. The President Janin made many voyages therewith great expedition. Some of the Duke of Birons seruants had a desire to rise. The Baron of Lux was rettyred to Saux, the King sent them word that they must seeke the prisoners liberty by proofes of obedience, and not by effects of rebellion, and that he would iudge of his intentions by the behaiour of his seruants. The Townes of Dijon and Beaune intrenched themselves against the Castells, who (acknowledging that it were not only a rashnesse, but an iniustice to fall from their obedience) deliuered the places into the Marshall Lauardins hands for the King. Bresse continued quiet through the care of Bosse. All France was in Peace, euery man detesting the Duke of Biron and his Adherents. The King seemed to be very well satisfied, seeing things to succeed better then he expected, hauing found all obedience and submission in them who in shewe were most bold and resolute to trouble his affayres. He was more respected and feared of them then euer, and there was no man so great, but did humble himselfe. He sayde openly, that he was resolu'd not to indure his Subiects to play any more

A more with their King, abusing his bounty as many had done, contemning his actions as vniustly and rashly as without punishment. The Prisoners were led to the Bastille at Paris on the Saterdag after. The Duke of Biron going in the Boat seemed heauy and Pensue. The Count of Auvergne was merry and Dined. The Duke of Firon entered into the Bastille as into a Graue. The Count of Auvergne went as to the Louure, and imagined that the place where he should be, could not be a Prison. The King entered into the City the same night, and the people with great cries of Ioy, blessed his returne, and pray'd God for their Captiuitie that would haue brought France againe into seruitude. There were new forces which passed the Alpes. The Spanish Ambassador demanded passage for Flanders, beseeching the King not to beleue that his Master was acquainted with the Duke of Birons desseignes. There was some likelihood that their journey was not so farre, for they could not but arrive to late, Count Maurice was entred into Brabant, to passe into Flanders to the releefe of Ostend. The Archduke was prepared to hinder him; they must measure their forces, & it was most certaine before this new army had past the Alpes, they had met. This made their marching to be much suspected, & had done more, if the President Janin had not assured the King, that the Baro of Lux would not giue care to the offers that were made him, promising to bring him to the Court, where the King offered him all surety. His Maiesty was aduertised that the Count of Fuentes (one of the cheefe Instigators of the Duke of Birons Conspiracy with the Duke of Sauoy) had caused his forces to aduance vnder colour of sending them into Flanders, to giue fauour and countenance to his Partisans that were in Bresse and Burgundy to encourage them and to withdraw them from his Maiesties obedience. For these reasons as the Ambassador of Spaine did presse to haue the passage of the Riuer of Rhofne free. The King who beleueed that by reason of things past, he could not be to distrustfull answered, I will not leaue the Frontier vnarmed, vntill I be satisfied by the arraignment of the Duke of Firon, what account I shall make of the faith of the King of Spaine your Maister, touching the obseruation of the Peace. You will haue me beleue that he was ignorant of the plots and practises layde with the Count of Fuentes, and I answer that it is hard to beleue that his money, hath bene so bountefully employed without his priuiey and command: yet I meane not to breake the commerce that is allowed by our Treaties. He had only commanded the Marshall Lauardin to Lodge and Campe vpon the frontier, to defend the entry of his Estates. D'Albigny hauing bragged; that if he attempted to retrench the passage, he should loone haue it laide open by Aumes. But the Spaniards durst not attempt to passe the Bridge of Gresin, fearing to be Repulst and Charged, & rettyred to Rumilly and Anicy. In the end the King seeing that they feared more their owne harme, then they had any desire to do harme, he suffered them to passe.

But to retune to the Duke of Biron, it was a strange thing that hauing consulted with himselfe, whether he should come to Court or not, he neglected his Friends aduice, and tooke the worst resolution. A mind transported with passion, reiects the best reasons, and retains the most dangerous opinions. Like vnto a Boulter which lets the Flower passe, and keepest nothing but the Branne. Before his departure from Dijon, they said at Maisilles that he was taken, and in parting his friends sent him word that he should leaue his Head where he carried it: and that there was no returne for him. Neuer Prisoner was better Garded with more Care, Order, and Vigilancy. The King caused the Duke to be kept as in his owne Houfe, and at liberty. And for that Nature hath found no other remedies against the iniuries of Fortune, and the wearinesse of Life, then Death, they feared that he would offer Violence to himselfe. And therefore those which kept him, carried no Armes, and seeing himselfe sent with a Knife without a poynt, he sayd it was the way to the Graue. Scorning at death, he sayd, that it could not come vnlooked for, to a Man well resolu'd, nor strange to him that hath foreseene it, nor shamefull to a resolute Minde. Yet he found that it is a miserable life not to be able to dye, being deprived of all meanes to aduance Death, and to haue no other consolation but in the onely desire of an impossible thing.

He spent the first dayes of his Imprisonment, without eating or sleeping. These A violent motions of Choller, and the heat of his blood, put him into a Feauer, and Griefe carried fuming passions vnto his Braine, which increased his sicknesse, in the which (as in all other diseases) the feare of Death, the payne of his Body, and the alteration of his Life, did much augment the greefe of his Prison. Hee was some- what affrayd least vnder colour of remedy, they should giue him Poyson to cure all his griefes, and therefore hee would haue them take a taste of euery thing, although there were no other assurance of his life, but what his owne Conscience could giue vnto him.

His words in Prison.

His Captiuitie deprived him not of the liberty of speaking. The fire of his Courage was not smothered vnder the Ashes of this affliction. What saide hee? and what saide he not? Choller thrust forth a steeme of Words, in the which there was not a droppe of Reason. Sometimes hee saide; That if they desired to put him to death, they should dispatch him; that they should not bragge they had made him to feare death; that they should speedily drinke themselves drunke, with the blood which remained of thirty and five Woundes, which hee had receiued for the seruice of France. They feared that Solitarinesse, Fasting, Melancholy and change of the place would trouble his Braine, and thrust him into some furious passion. To pacifie the discontent of his first imprisonment, they perswaded him to submit himselfe to the mercy of God, and gaue him hope of the Kings pardon. The Archbishop of Bourges went to see him, he dissuaded him from many bad Maximes of Conscience, and satisfied him of many poynts which hee held against the purity and integrity of a iust Confession: He desired to speake with Villerey and Silery, who went to see him by the Kings commandment. In the beginning of his imprisonment, hee talked of nothing but of Iustice, but knowing his fault hee had no hope but in the Kings Mercy. Someone published an admonition at Paris, beseeching the King to change the punishment of death into perpetual Imprisonment, his Imprisonment into Banishment, and his Banishment into an honourable seruitude to make War against the Turke. That if by his offences hee did not merit to serue the State, which hee sought to ruine, yet he might serue the Generall Estate of Christendome. This Councell was dangerous, for who could assure the King that he would make War in Hungary: and what caution could be sufficient for France? Hee had bene more dangerous without it, then with it. A burning firebrand casts more flame and smoke without a Chimney, then with it. Hee added moreouer, that he should forbid him the carrying of Armes, and tie him from the War, but if he should haue made his house his Prison, who should haue kept him? if he had designes of revenge in Prison, what would hee haue done at Liberty? Many which respect no more the Lawes of Honour, then of Iustice, would haue repayed vnto him, to bring in incurable mitchiefs. I here was an intent to saue him. The Iron worke was forged in Bresse. The refusal of five hundred Crownes, for the Petardier hindred the execution. As soone as he was a Prisoner, euery one saide he was a dead Man: and seeing himselfe so carefully garded, hee sayde; that they did not put Birds of his sort into a Cage, to suffer them to escape. Hee made that Iudgement of himselfe, which the Admirall did of the Earles of Egmont and Harne, when he heard they were Prisoners: when they once come to accuie and imprison a Man of courage and faction, it is more dangerous to absolve him then to condemne him. The King sent his Letters to the Parliament, to proceed in the Criminall and extraordinary Processe of the Duke of Biron, according to the formes which are to bee obserued in Crimes of so great importance, against persons of his quality: all other attayres set aside. The Commissioners appointed for the King, were Achilles de Harlay first President in the Court of Parliament at Paris. Nicholas Potier second President and Councillor of State to his Maiesty. Stephen Fleury and Phillibert of Thuin, Councillors of the Parliament, good Iudges, but not to bee moued in Crimes of State. Informations were taken at the Bastille. The Prisoner made some Ceremonies to answer, but being entred into discourse, hee gaue the Commissioners

A matter ynough to worke on, confessing in a manner all. From his answers alone they might haue framed his Condemnation, saying ynough to make him loose as many Liues as hee had Yeares. Hee had so ill gouerned his Iudgement in his Prosperity, as it did him no seruice during his Imprisonment; yeelding sometimes vnto Griefe, sometimes vnto Choller, and alwayes to Indiscretion, speaking as much to Ruine himselfe, as to Discharge him. Hee was Confronted with the Witnesses Face to Face; but when a hee did see la Fin, hee fell into an extreme shaking. The first President asked the Prisoner If hee would except any thing against La Fin. He answered; That he held him for a Gentleman of Honour, his Friend, and his Kinsman. But when hee had heard his Deposition, hee cried out against him as the most execrable Man in the World, appealing to all the Powers of Heauen and Earth, to iustifie his Innocency. La Fin grieved that he should hold him for a Slanderer (a name common to all wicked Men) sayd vnto him: That he was sorry they were in a place where the one was allowed to speake all, and the other was forced to heare all. Hee maintained all he had saide against him, and spake more playnely of his Conspiracy, then in his Deposition. The Prisoner said, That if Renaze were there, he would auerre the contrary. He was brought before him, wher at he was much amazed to see him, whom he held to be dead; and who was out of his remembrance, as in an other World. Hee then beleueed that the Duke of Sauoy had set him at Liberty to ruine him, he felt his Conscience toucht, when as all things conspired to his Condemnation. An admirable Iudgement of Gods secret Iustice, in this escape of Renaze. Mens intentions produce contrary effects. Hee was detayned prisoner at Quiers in Piedmont, to the end he should not discouer this practise; he escapes from his Gard, and comes to fortifie his Maisters Deposition, who else had bene but one witnesse.

He is amazed to see Renaze whom he held to be dead.

He had many Friends, but not to iustifie his Innocency, as Plato sayth, That many Friends is a signe of Wisdome, and want of them shewes the contrary. There were none that durst presume to sue for his Liberty or Pardon. The King had made this attempt so Detestable and Odious to all the Princes and Noble men of the Court, and the meanes to execute it so execrable, as all his Friends were silent: there were some that saide, that for any other crime, yea if he had killed a Prince in the Kings Cabinet, they would haue begged his pardon, and would haue sacrificed their Children to the Kings Iustice for an expiation of the Offence; rather then to loose him. But in this acte, Friendship was Conspiracy, and Intercession a Crime. His Friends went to S. Maur where the King was: they cast themselves at his Maiesties feet to implore his Mercy, and to moderate the severity of his Iustice, more in consideration of his Father, then for any respect of the Sonnes seruices which could not equall his fault. The King said, That it was a matter of such importance for his Estate, that he was constrained to leaue it to the course of Iustice; that to haue attempted against him who was his King, and his Benefactor was insupportable; that he could not remit this Crime, but he must ruine himselfe, the Queene his Wife, his Sonne, and his Estate. That he knew they were such true hearted Frenchmen, that as they desired not the one, so they would haue patience for the other. They hauing knowne the foulnesse of the fact, and the reasons which forced Clemency to yeeld vnto Iustice, abandoned the purpose. The Countesse of Rouffy solicited the Court. The Prisoners Mother was not there. The King commanded the Court of Parliament to proceede to Iudgement, without any intermission. The Prisoner was a Peere of France, the Baronic of Biron being made a Duchie and a Paire by the King. A Peere cannot be iudged but by the King and his Peeres, but the King is neuer present when he is a Party, and that the accusation of the Party concernes his Person, his Honour, or his Estate. And although the Order of the Ancient Peeres be more in number then by the first institution, for that of the six Secular Peeres, five are vnited vnto the Crowne, and the six doth no more obey the King, yet the newe created enioy the same Priuileges and Prerogatiues that the ancient did, and the last although he be about the number, shal not bee iudged but by his Peeres: but may assist at the Iudgement of another Peere,

No man dares sue for him.

But if the Peeres being called do not appeere, they may proceed. The Peeres of France were called to the arraignment of the Duke of Biron, they appeared not.

themselves.

The Court forbear not to proceed, notwithstanding their absence. All the Chambers beeing assembled, the Chancellor accompanied by Maisses and Pontcarre (two Councillors of the State) entred into the Parliament, two Sargents at armes and some officers of the Chancery going before him. Hee was received at the entring of the Barre by two ancient Councillors, and beeing saluted by the Court, hee set him downe in the Presidents place: hauing deliuered the Kings intention, and his assurance of the integrity and wisdom of the Court, vpon an occasion importing the State, and vpon a foule crime in a person other waies recommended for his seruices, he made a signe to Stephen Fleury the Reporter of the Proceffe to begin. This was done for want of the Peeres. A request was made in the prisoners name, that it would please the Court to allow him Councell to direct him in the formes of their proceeding, whereof he was as ignorant, as he had let all France know how well hee understood the Art of War. De la Gesle the Kings Attorney Generall being heard vpon this request, and Seruin the Soliciter Generall speaking for him, he said, that although this request seemed to be grounded vpon some Presidents for that the like had bin granted vnto the Prince of Condé. Yet there was great diuersity and many considerations for the denying of this. Their opinions being giuen, it was reiectéd. Cicero pleaded for Rabirius and Anthony for Norbanus, but there is no Aduocate admitted for Treason; Counsell depends of the Conscience of him that is accused, his defence must come from his owne innocency, and hee may well free himselfe from blame, without the mediation of any man, and without the helpe of an Aduocate. If he be innocent, Truth will confound all the practises of his Accusers; If hee be Guilty there is no excuse nor euasion but his guiltinesse will appeare. It is not lawfull to defend the Wicked, and Good men haue no neede of Defence. They spent three sittings to examine the informations, which done, the conclusions of the Attorny Generall were read and followed. There rested nothing but to heare the Prisoner and to call him before the Parliament. While they were viewing of the Proceffe, one had set vp a discourse vpon the Pallace Gate, to moue the Iudges to pitty, and that they should not punish the weaknesse of Adam, for the Serpents subtilty. The Lord of Montigny came vnto the Bastille about foure of the clocke in the morning; the Prisoner who alwayes slept little, (holding sleepe to bee no life) was already vp and at his Deuotion: hee would not trouble him in so necessary an action, but stayed vntill he had done. Entering into his Chamber, hee told him the occasion of his coming, that the Court was assembled for his Proceffe; that the Lord Chancellor was there, and had commanded him to bring him. Hee seemed a little troubled, although he had bene aduertised that hee should bee sent for. Being ready, hee goes out off the Bastille, thinking neuer to returne, and that they drewe him out off the cares of Captiuitie, to leade him vnto the darknesse of Death, and that hee left the prison to loofe his Life. Hee was conducted in the Marquis of Rhoisies Carosse, through the Arcenall to the Riuer side, where he entred into a Boate couered with Tapistrie, in the which the Kings Gardes were, The chiefe Approches, the Ports, the Greue and the Towne house, were manned with Swisses. Hee entred into the Pallace by the first Presidents Garden, and went to rest himselfe in one of the Chambers, vntill hee were sent for, presenting him a Breakfast before he entred.

He enters and is heard in the Garde chamber.

The houre beeing come, the Register went to call him, and hee entered into the Golden Chamber. The place whereas Strangers haue come to implore Iustice of the King; whereas great Kings haue held it an Honour to haue a place: where 1602. A where he himselfe had set, & had bin honoured with the most glorious Titles of Vertue: whereas one of the Kings Soliciters had said; That Biron had none before him to imitate: that he could imitate none but himselfe, and that he made himselfe imitable to them that should come after him. This Place I say, shining with the beames of the Kings Iustice, made him to remember the change of his condition, the which made him somewhat to blush: an accident which happens to the most assured. These Scarlet Roabes do more amaze him then all the red Cassocks of Spain, or the most fierce incounters of his enemies. Hee had no other place, then that which was appointed for men accused, being set vpon a stoole within the Barre, but finding himselfe to lare off to heare, or to be heard; hee rose vp, and carried his stoole neerer, saying vnto the Chancellor, Excuse mee my Lord, I cannot heare you, except you speake louder. When the Duke of Alanson was examined before the King, and in open Court, he was set in the midst of the Hall vpon a lowe Stoole; the Constable of Luxemburg, the Duke of Nemours, and the Chancellor of Poyet, were set within the Barre like to the Duke of Biron. He sat with his Cloake vnder his right arme, holding his Hand sometimes by his side, after a brauing manner, the which notwithstanding did not become him ill, hauing his Armes free to lift vp his Hand to Heauen, and to strike his Breast, when he would protest of his Loyalty to the Kings Seruice. They would not haue allowed it in another, being expected that men accused should shew Humility outwardly, and Feare inwardly.

In this Estate the Duke of Biron thought that in this great Senate hee should finde some one that would doe for him as Sempronius Gracchus had done for Scipio, that hee would speake openly, that he would neuer indure the Common weale should receive that disgrace to see Scipio set in the Rancke and Habit of Men accused for Crimes. Hee whome the Court had seene sit vpon the Flower-de Luce, in recompence of the great seruices which he had done. The Chancellor fitted his discourse in such sort, as there was no occasion to call him by his name, nor by those of his qualities. Of many points that were in his Proceffe he collected five principall, the rest consisted in presumptions, whereof he made no accompt. For that wee must neuer moue the opinion of the Iudges vpon a matter that is without proofe. The first was to haue had Conference with one called Picoté borne at Orleans and fled into Flamanders, to haue intelligence with the Archduke, and had giuen him a hundred and fifty Crownes for two Voyages to that effect. The second was; That hee had Treated with the Duke of Sauoy three dayes after his coming to Paris, without the Kings permission, offering him all Assistance and Seruice against all Men, vpon hope of Marriage with his third Daughter. The third, that hee had had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy in the taking of Bourg and other places, giuing him aduice to Attempt against the Kings Army, and against his owne person, discovering many things of importance. The fourth was; That he would haue brought the King before S. Katherins Fort to bee slaine there: and to that ende had written to the Gouverneur, giuing him some tokens whereby he should know his Maestie. The fift was;

That hee had sent la Fin to Treat with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentès. The Duke of Biron denied all that hee had confessed at his first examination, holding it no danger to suppress the Truth, when as Confession may hurt. To the first the Duke of Biron answered, That Picoté being his prisoner in the Franch County and knowing that hee was acquainted with Captaine la Fortune, (who was his friend) he thought hee might employ him for the reduction of the Towne of Seyre, wherein he vsed such diligence, as the place was assured for his Maesties Seruice: that since this reduction hee had not seene Picoté but in Flanders, when as hee went for the Confirmation of the Peace, where he came vnto him with some others, intreating him to be an Intercessor for them vnto the King, that they might returne vnto their Goods, and liue in their owne Houses, promising him for recompence of his intercession two Sutes of Tapistrie, the which he reiectéd, with some spleene, for that they fought to buye his fauour; and for that they desired from him an

 „ That it was true that Picoté had receiued a hundred and fiftie Crownes of him, but „ for any other respect, but for the charges he had bene at in the reduction of Searre, „ hauing often intreated him, and prest him by many letters, to haue pittie on him, as of „ one that was banished from his house and Countrie, hauing borrowed this summe to „ beare his charges in this reduction. That he had put it to account in certaine summes „ which he had disbursed for the Kings seruice, or that he neuer had any other business or 2 „ conference with him. To the second, hee answered, that hee came to Paris fiftene „ dayes after the Duke of Sauoyes arrivall there; that La Fin who accused him, came af„ ter him. That it was true, the King dyning at Conflans, and the Duke of Sauoy with him, B „ after dinner the King retyring into his wardrope, he commanded the Count of Au- „ vergne and him, to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy: That the Count of Sossions, and the

 „ to the wardrope, tyed the Kings poynts, gaue him drinke, and presently after went to „ Paris. That vpon some speech which Roncas the Dukes Secretary had with him touch„ ing the marriage of his Highnes thirde daughter, hee acquainted the King therewith, „ who hauing since giuen him to vnderstand by La Force, that hee did not like thereof, he „ had no more drempt of it. And in token that hee had no intelligence with the Duke, „ nor Wil to conspire with any of his, the King hauing commanded him to accompany „ him in his returne, and to shew him the strongest Townes in Bourgogne, hee had ex- C „ cused himselfe, beseeching his Maiestie to dispence with him, fore-seeing that the Duke „ would not effect the Treatie, and that hee should bee greued to make warre against „ a Prince, whome hee had accompanied, and made good cheere vnto. Aduising the „ Baron of Lux to conduct him through the weakest Townes, and not to giue him any „ time to vew their fortifications.
 3 „ To the third, that hee had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, in the conquest of the „ Countrie of Bresse, giuing him aduise to attempt against the Kings army. He answered, „ that if he had had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, hee would not haue vnderaken „ Bourg, against the Kings opinion, being not assisted by any, but such as were ordinarily D „ with him. That the Gouvernours of places (who were then the Dukes subiects and now „ the Kings) could witness if there were any fauour vsed. And if in making warre, hee had „ any other object, but the execution of his Maiesties commandements. That if he had „ had any bad intent, he had not yeelded vp Bourg so easily as he did. To the fourth, vpon 4 „ the aduise giuen to the Gouvernour of Saint Katherins Fort to kill the King. He be-„ seecheth his Maiestie to remember, that hee alone did dissuade and diuert him from „ going to vew the Fort, giuing him to vnderstand, that there were very good Gunners „ in the place, and that he could not goe without great danger. That vpon this aduise, „ his Maiestie altered his purpose, saying, that if hee desired to see the place, hee would „ bring him a plot of it the next day, offering his Maiestie to take it with fiftie hundred „ hargubuziers, and that he himselfe would goe vnto the assault. To the fift, that he had E „ treated with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentès by the mediation of La Fin.
 „ He answered that being denied the keeping of the Cittadell of Bourg, hee grew into 5 „ that dispayre, as he had desired to bee all couered with bloud, being capable to say „ or to doe any thing. At these words the Chancellor asked him, with what bloud hee „ desired to bee couered? with mine owne answered the Prisoner, wishing to liue no „ longer after this refusal, and I would haue engaged my selfe in such sort among the e„ nemies, as I would haue dyed there, or would haue returned all couered with bloud.
 „ That for two moneths space he had written and spoken more then he ought, but he had „ not omitted to doe well. Hee added moreouer that La Fin had foe bewitched him „ with inehanted waters, and by speaking Images, as hee was forced to submit himselfe F „ to his will: That he spake not vnto him, but in secret & vknowne words, calling him his
 „ ble things against La Fin, to moue the Court not to regard his accusation, & testimony.

Ulysses accusation, forging false letters from Priam to Palamedes. He still fled to his par„ don, saying that hauing done nothing since, the Kings clemency should remit his fault, „ and that if he must implore it once more, he had his Knees as supple as euer to doe it.
 „ The Chancellor sayd vnto him, that he had written a letter vnto la Fin since the Dau- „ phins Birth, by the which hee did aduertise him, that seeing it had pleased God to fend „ the King a Sonne, he would no more dreame of those vanities, desiring him to returne, „ and if he had not employed him he would not haue written. This letter was produced „ to shewe the continuance of his bad desseignes, whereof he made vie to iustifie him„ selfe and to shewe his repentance, saying alwaies that hee had done well, although hee B „ had some thought of doing ill. The Chancellor sayd vnto him, that seeing he felt his „ conscience so cleere, and knowing that hee had done nothing, why did he not laie him„ selfe more open vnto the King, who sought him with great affection at Fontainebleau, „ to tell him the truth of that which hath bene since discovered by the processe. Hee „ wauered at this demand, saying that he did not thinke the King had knowne any thing „ of that which had passed betwixt him and La Fin, for that hee had assured him by othes „ and fearefull curses, that hee had sayd nothing that might hurt him. That hauing con„ ferred with a religious man of the order of the Minimes, to knowe (if hauing past his „ word with an othe to La Fin, neuer to discover what had past betwixt them) he might „ with a safe conscience say anything? He had answered him, that seeing there was no C „ more any intent to execute the things that were sworne betwixt them, he ought not to „ reueale them: That this resolution continued so constant in his minde, that although „ the Arch-bishop of Bourges had visited him in prison, and had giuen him many rea„ sons to free him from these scruples, yet hee held it an act vnworthy of a man to false-„ fie his oth, and that it was onely fit for a Soule hardened with Atheisme, (the spring of „ all impiety) to sweare with an intent to circumuent. Here his speech fayled him with „ the violence of his greefe, but recovering his spirits, he spake these words.

My misfortune hath this consolation, that my Iudges are not ignorant of the ser„ uices which I haue done to the King and Realme, and with what loyalte I haue carried „ my selfe in the greatest and most important affaires, to restore the King vnto the D „ Realme, and the Realme vnto the King: to preferue the Lawes of State, and to settle „ you in this place, from the which the saturnales of the League had expelled you.
 „ This Bodie (whereof you hold the life and death in the disposition of your Iustice) hath „ no veme which hath not bene opened, and which I would not willingly open for „ you. This hand which did write the letters, which are nowe produced against mee, is „ the same which hath done the contrary to that which it hath written. It is true, I „ haue written, I haue sayd, and I haue spoken more then I ought; but no man can „ shewe that I haue done ill. And there is no Lawe that punisheth the lightnesse of a „ simple word, or the motions of the thought with Death: my words haue bene al„ wayes Feminine, but the effects of my courage Masculine. Choller and Despight E „ haue made mee capable to say all, and to do all: but Reason would not suffer mee to „ doe any thing, but what deserved Praise and Imitation. I haue had bad desseignes, but „ they neuer past my thought. At the same instant they sprong vp, they were smothered.
 „ If I had bene desirous to nourish and make shewe of them, I haue had great meanes „ and occasions. I could haue done bad seruice to the King, in England and in Suiferland.
 „ There are aboute a hundred Gentlemen that can witness of my behauiour in the first „ Ambassage, and for the second, I desire no other testimony but that of the Seigneurs „ Sillery and de Vie, who know in what manner, & with what fidelity I employed my selfe to „ reconcile and vnite so many wills disioyned & with-drawne from the Kings alliance. If „ you will consider howe I came, and in what Estate I left the places of Bourgogne, F „ it wil be impossible to haue any badde conceite of my desseignes. They found not „ a man of Warre in my Government. I haue left the places without garnisons. I „ haue giuen the Captaines no other commandement but to serue the King well, and „ to doe that onely where vnto they are bound.

1602. Euery man aduised mee not to come to Court. I met a foote-man by the way who A brought me a letter from one of my dearest friends, who conured me not to aduise: being arruied, my sister of Roussy sent me an other, aduising me to be gone without taking of my leaue: I shewed it to a Gentleman that was with me, who sayd vnto mee, That he would willingly bee stabbed in the bosome, so as I were at Dijon. I answered, That if I were there and were assured to receiue a hundred stabbes at the Court yet I would I come vpon the Kings word. A guilty minde and prest with the horror of his conscience had fallen in peeces with feare and trembling, and would haue embraced an other party. The secret knowledge I had of my loyaltie, and the innocency of my desleignes, could not giue mee any imagination of distrust: I alwaies sayd within my selfe, I haue serued the King too well, to haue a thought that he should not account me B his seruant. The King hath had too many proofes of my Faith, to suspect my loyaltie.
 I could not comprehend, that the Kings Iustice, could touch a man resting in the tranquility of his conscience, and in the expectation of his commandements. Moreouer I was assured that the King had pardoned me, and that I had not offended him since his pardon. I cannot deny that I told him not all that had past in this action, but in saying vnto him that the refusall of the Cittadell of Bourg made me capable to say and do any thing, I did thinke it was not needefull to speecifie that which I was ashamed to haue attempted, and that the consideration of the good which I had done vnto the King in his seruice, should alwaies weigh downe the euill that I would haue done, and the which I haue repented. That if hee hath not giuen me life, but to put me to death, C hee must consider that it is more commendable for a Prince to giue it, then to take it away from him to whome he hath giuen it, and that his Clemency shines neuer more cleerly then vpon offences that concerne himselfe. If it please not the King to regard my seruices, and the assurances which hee hath giuen me of his mercy, I confesse my selfe worthy of death, and hope for no helth in his Iustice, but in yours, hoping you will remember better then he doth the dangers I haue vndergonne, all my life for his seruice. I implore his mercy, & although I should not say anything, yet the wounds which I beare would speake for me. I hope for it the more confidently, for that it hath neuer bene refused to them that haue done worse then my selfe. I would haue done euill, but my wil did neuer passe the tearmes of my first conception, being ouercast with the Cloudes of choller and despiight. It were hard if I should be the first president to bee D punnisht for thinking. Nor that I feare death, the which I hold to be ordayned, not as a punishment, but for the end of Nature, and that it imports nothing to leaue this life in the midst of my course, if it were with as much honour, as I haue had in the beginning. My fault is great, but it was onely in conceite and not executed: in desire and not in effect. Great offences must haue great fauours. I am alone in France, which feesles the rigour of Iustice and cannot hope for the meritor of mercy. Whatsoeuer chanceth, I relie more vpon you my Masters then in the King: who hauing heerto-fore regarded me with the eyes of his Loue, lockes no more of mee now but with choiler, and holds it a vertue to be cruell vnto me, and a vice to vse any act of Clemen- E cie towards mee. It had bene better for me that hee had not pardoned me at the first, then to giue me life and then to make me loose it with shame and dishonor.

They gaue him leaue to speake what he pleased, the Chancellor holding it reasonable, that seeing hee had no Councell to aduise him what hee should say, they should in regard thereof giue him time to speake all, and hearing, to consider his reasons, and the variety of his first answers with the last, in the which there were great contradictions. Those which are accused of any crime take it for a fauor to be heard patiently vnto the ende: although for the most part they do but increase the reasons of their punishments. Hee spake so boldly and so eloquently, as if a man should iudge of the fauour of a discours by the attention, there was not any one of long time heard with greater patience in that place. Some shed teares in the place and wept in their houses, for pittie, not of his innocency (for that appeared not) but of his fortune to miserably delected. Heate is more naturall to a man then cold; and mildnesse more then rigour:

 that Passion, Fauor, or Respect, should alter the integritie of their Iudgements. The opinions of some weake spirits may be moued, who regard more the apparence, then the essence of things, & which beleue not the harme vnles they feele it, or that the fire is whott, vnlesse it burne them. The prisoners discourse was so long, as they had no time to giue their opinions. He was sent backe to the Bastille, returning more cheerefully then he came, for as in going forth of the Bastille to the Pallace, he imagined that he went to his death, so seeing himselfe brought backe, he conceived that he returned to life. And for that he had answered the Chancellor to all his demands, and had moued some of his Iudges to lament his misfortune, many to detest his accuser, and all to wish B that the fowlenes of his offence, and the good of the State would allow of his pardon.
 He thought that he had so ballanced their opinions, as Mercy should preuaile aboue Rigour. He therefore neuer ceased all Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, to relate vnto the Captaines, and to the Gard, that kept him, all that had bene demanded of him. what he had answered, and how brauely and discretely he had satisfied all, adding with-all, that he did imagine he saw the Chauncellors countenance going out of the great Chamber. He did counterfet him in his staydnesse and the grauitie of his words, fit for a man of his age and qualitie, imagining, that he spake in this manner. Behold a wicked Man, he is dangerous in the State, we must dispatch him, he deserves death. Which words neuer came out of his mouth, hauing carried himselfe very respectiue in this C Arraignement, hauing neuer pronounced that word of Death, but in concluding the Iudgement. And therein he alwaies vsed some words to qualifie his griefe in the image of his Affliction, more then of his Innocencie, vnable to forget the remembrance of the good that was past, or the feeling of the present euill. These were the last fits of the prisoners hope, the which finding no solide bodie, runne after the shaddowes of his imagination, and flattered him so pleasingly, as he thought not to die, saying, that they could not supplie his place, if hee were dead. Noting among all them, that thought themselves most capable, great Wants and Imperfections. Yet in all these extremities he had nothing that lulled him so much asleepe as his owne prayles. Sometimes hee would say, Is it possible, that the King should bee so vaine, as to make him to ap-Dprehend death, and to thinke to terrifie him therewith. But hee conceived of things according to his imagination, the which was not answerable to the truth.

On Munday the Chauncellor returned to the Pallace to determine on his sentence. The They continued vntill two of clocke in the afternoone in giuing of their opinions. They were drawne from one principle of truth, as manie Lines are from one Center, & did concurre all in one resolution conformable to the conclusions of the Kings Attornie generall. That it was iust, necessarie, and profitable to quench these burning flames of Ambition in the bloud of the Duke of Biron, if they would not see all the realme in combustion. A whole day, and a good part of the night would haue bene spent, if euery one had giuen a reason of his opinion. Those of the great Chamber onely, E and the Presidents of the Inquests spake what they would. This subiect is like vnto a great & thicke forest, they know not what Tree to choofe: It is so full and so rich, as a boundaie of reasons troubles the choise: And these were the cheefe. There was a concurrence of a great Crime & a great Merit. All France was a witnes of the one: and of the other the truth was apparent. The proofes which are required to discover a secret crime are here made perfect. Proofs by mouth, & the prisoners answers. Proofs by writings, letters and instructions. Proofs by the Deposition of witnesses, against whom he hath objected no exception, which might impugne that which they sayd & maintained.

By these 3. sorts of proofes we see that monstrous attempt against the Kings person F verified, & that furious Cospiracie to trouble his Estate, & to make it a prey to his enemies, & both the one and the other doth make the prisoner guiltie of high Treason in the first and second degree. Hee confesseth that hee would haue done ill, that his intent was written and imparted to others, and yet he neuer did ill. That it neuer paſt A his thought. That thoughts are not to bee puniſhed as he ſayd. That the deſire to ſteale makes not a theefe: It is true, but the guilt of treaſon is ſo deteſtable, as the intent how farre ſo euer from the execution, is puniſhed and reputed for the effect. Repentance which followes after, and changeth the deſſeine, may well ſerue for the offence, but it helpes nothing for the puniſhment. A Gentleman hauing attempted to kill King Francis the firſt, repented, and revealed it in his confeſſion, yet being accuſed by his Confefſor, he loſt his head. As the reſpect of the image of God, grauen in the Maieſty of Kings, frees them from all Lawes made by men, ſo the dignitie of their perſons doth warrant them from al enterpriſes, & conſpiracies of humane malice, the which dares not once thinke to put them in practiſe againſt their Images, much leſſe againſt their Perſons. The prooſe of an intent, although it were not reſolued nor determined goes not unpuniſhed, which paſſeth often times vnto things without life. To Howſes, Images, Aſhes, yea and to the memorie it ſelfe: This crime troubleth the dead, thirtie or fortie yeares after their funerals: for that it is not extinct in dying, and (the which is contrary to common ſence, and naturall humanitie) they puniſh the Child, the Wife, and the Familie, for the Fathers offence, being a contagious Leproſie, and hereditarie to all his race: The Father cannot excuſe his Sonne. And the Senator Fulvius was commended to haue put his Sonne to death, for that he had bene one of Catelines conſpiracie. Let him then plead no more, that he hath done no euill, it ſufficeth that he could haue done it. Lawes are not made for bad actions onely, but for Councells alſo and reſolutions. His intent began the crime, occaſion had ended it, if hee had not bene preuented. If he had done no other euill, but to giue care to the promiſes and perſuaſions of the enemies he were guiltie. For in matters of State, the ſubiect cannot diſpoſe of any point of his will, without the permiſſion of his Prince. We muſt not ſlay trivenimous beaſts haue bitten, and then kill them, nor Traitors intents executed, ere wee diſcouer the Treason. It is then to late to iudge of the crime, but to complaine of indiscretion: then they ſeek no more releefe from Law, but they flie to Armes. It is not then time to accuſe and to puniſh, but to weepe and to flie. The Cittie of Rome laboured in vaine to reſiſt Cæſar, after that he had ſubuerſed the Lawes, ſurped the Dictatorſhip, and terrified all Italie with the brute of his forces. If they ſhould haue ſtayd vntill the priſoner had executed his deſſeins, there had bene no talking of Iuſtice, nor of State. You muſt not rattle till the houſe ſhake, and be readie to fall, you muſt vnder-proppe it, and repaire it in time. It is a miſerie ſayd the Emperour Domitian, when they will not beleue a Conſpiracie againſt Princes, vntill they bee ſlaine by the Conſpirators. Now that God by a ſingular worke of his providence hath diſcouered this Conſpiracie, it toucheth the health of the State, & the honor of the Court, to puniſh theſe Conſpirators. Reason requires that the example may make knowne how execrable this offence is, for the which it is lawfull to torment the dead, and terrifie them that be liuing, to make the Children partakers of their Fathers puniſhment, and to aſſure them rather of miſerie then of life, that the world might haue more horror of his wickednes then feare of his puniſhment. The Kings Clemencie hath had his turne, now Iuſtice muſt take hers, making her authoritie to be feared and admired, like vnto the Sea which is more admired when the waues are ſwolne, & riſen vp to the clouds, then when it is calme and ſtill. But they conſider the qualitie & merit of the priſoner. Firſt Iuſtice hath her eyes blinded, and ſhut from al diſtinctiſons, but that it houlds the offence greater in a great perſon, then in a meane, and by this propoſition, the puniſhment muſt be greater. The faults of meane men are hidden in the multitude, their fortune and reputation is one thing. Thoſe which rayſed to great places, doe good or harme by the example of their good or bad actions, are they which are knowne and diſcouered to all men. In matters of rebellion and crimes of State, they regard not what is paſt, they looke only to the preſent, & what they may expect hereafter: The moſt vertuous actions yeeld to the violence of the bad. The accuſed hath ſerued the King, it was his dutie, hee hath bene recompenced. He hath attempted againſt his ſeruiſe, therein hee hath done

1602.

A done what he ought not. The offences and the puniſhment are Twyns: at the ſame inſtant that hee hath offended, hee drawes vpon him the rigour of the puniſhment. If with Antipater, he hath carried vpon his bodie the markes of vertue, there is nothing now to be ſeene but ſignes of infidelitie in his heart. His merits haue mounted to the greatnes of theſt dignities in France, his ill deſeruings caſt him downe with ſhame, and ſhew him to be unworthie of thole excellent degrees of honour. Good ſeruiſe cannot enter into compariſon with bad, nor crimes in paratell with merits. The offence which is greater then the ſeruiſe, changeth the bond of recompence into puniſhment.
He that hepes to build a houſe, deſerues much of the owner, but when he lets fire to it, all the remembrance of the good which he hath done vaniſheth away. The accuſed B hath had a good ſhare in the reſtoring of the State, but ſence he would haue vndermy-ned it, and rained the foundations: He hath practiſed to make it a prey to the enemy, they can no more returne to that which he hath done, they iudge what he would haue done, and ſhall haue no other eſteeme or reputation, but as an Ariſton, or a Nabis, or a Catelin. He hath bene profitable to the State, it is true. But he hath offended againſt the Lawes of State. Their preſeruation is ſo neceſſarie, as it were better to looſe the moſt profitable members in an Eſtate, then to ſuffer them to be violated, for in putting them to death, it doth but decreaſe the number of valiant Men, but in ſuffering them to lue, you doe wrong vnto the Lawes, and thereby ruine the quiet of the State. Hee hath done well for the preſeruation of the State, it is true. But he that ſeekes to diſtroy C what hee hath preſerued makes himſelfe an enemy, and the remembrance of his well deſeruing dies in the iniurie which he would haue done to the whole bodie. Hee hath begun well, but he ended ill. All actions are cenſured by the end. If the heels, that is to ſay) Conſtancie and firmenes, had not failed in Achilles, he had bene immortal. It is not ſufficient for a man to begin to do well, if he deſiſts in the midſt, and continues not vnto the end, who deſerued better at Rome then Manlius, the only preſeruer of the Capitoll againſt the Gauls? and who was more ſeuereſly puniſhed then he, whom they caſt downe headlong from the Capitoll, for his Faſtions and Mutinies?

If it were a crime not to ſerue the Prince, was it not execrable to hinder, and to cōpire againſt his ſeruiſe? As the ſeruiſes done by the Accuſed, cannot be compared D with his offence, ſo his qualitie cannot moderate his puniſhment. Iuſtice hath no eyes to regard a Dukes Crowne, a Maſhal of France his Staffe, nor a blew Ribād. All theſe are no prerogatiues, but that he which attempts to trouble the State, ſhall be held an enemy to the Maieſtie of the Prince, & the publike good. Great men are greatly puniſhed.
Dignities aggrauate the offence vpon him that is bound not to offend. The greater the bond is, the more execrable is the ingratitude. There is no gentleman in France more bound vnto his Prince then the Accuſed. If duties & bonds hould no place in the affections of ſubiects to their Prince, to what Altar ſhall they goe to ſeek aſſurance of faith? muſt not the King in theſe continuall doubts of diſloyaltie, trauſe the agard of his perſon vnto Strangers, as Leuis the xxi. did vnto the Scottiſhmen. And finding no Religi-E on nor Conſcience among Men, trauſt vnto Beaſts, as Meſſaiſſa did? God is offended when as reſpect of the qualitie with-houlds the courſe of Iuſtice, and threatens that Eſtate with ruine, wherein they ſuffer a wicked ſubiect to lue. Achab felt the heavy hand of his wrath, for that he ſaued the life of Benadad. As this furious deſire of ſoueraigne cōmand troubles al the conſiderations of Nature, Friendſhip, & Dutie. So in puniſh-ing them we muſt neither regard the reſpects of bloud, the remembrance of ſeruiſes, nor the motions of friendſhip. The offence is of too great a conſequence to diſſemble it. He that doth not puniſh an euill, allowes of it. But they ſay it hath bene pardoned, that we muſt not open a wound which hath bene cloſed vp. Kings and Fortune doe often pardon, to puniſh them more ſeuereſly that haue abuſed their pardon. The Priſoner confelleth that he did not ſay al, & a pardon cannot extend, but to thoſe things that haue F bin mentioned & confeſſed, the greateſt part of the offence hath remained in the wil of the repentant, he hath cōfeſſed but little. There was a great difference betwixt him that did pardon, & him that demanded pardon. The King pardoned to the end he ſhould not

It appeeres by his confession, and by that which hee hath sayd in the face of the Court, when as he was demanded why hee had not descouered his offence freely vnto the King, whē as he gaue him so great assurance to forget it. He answered, that he did not thinke La Fin had sayd any thing, and that he kept his word, hauing confirmed it with great othes, that if he had acquainted him with that which hee had descouered to the King, hee would haue cast himselfe at his Maiesties feete as readily as he did to craue pardon. Their was then some thing betwixt them that was not yet pardoned. They which offend do often misreckon the time, seeking to excuse their fault. The conference of Times discouers the continuance of Intentions. The pardon was in January, and after September he writes, that seeing it had pleased God to giue the King a Dauphin, he would no more thinke of those vanities, and La Fin addes that there was a billet of a contrary tenor, that the negotiation was continued, and that the King had no knowledge thereof from the prisoner. The pardon should haue drawne him to repentance, and not to ingage him in new trecheries, the which could not bee remitted nor pardoned, for that he had offended often without punishment. He must not continue his errors, the last payes for all the precedent. The Court allowes not of this pardon in a crime that is beyond all pardon, & wherof the abolishment depends not of the King, who may not bee prodigall of his subiects blood, nor bring the helth of all in generall in danger, for one in particular. This reason moued Alexander to put Philotas to death, being giuen to vnderstand that if he pardoned him, he would make him able to attempt new treasons against him, when as it should not bee in his power to pardon him. A pardon doth not change the bad intent of a mighty malefactor. This Philotas knewe well, that they which had exhausted all mercy, and drawne it driehauiug no more hope, did runne head-long into dispaire. That there are benefites which are odious, for that hee blusheth to confesse the cause and to acknowledge himselfe debtor for his life to any one. Alexander had enemies enough abroad, he had no neede of any at home, and assuring his Estate of these, hee needed not to feare the rest. Kings like vnto Physicians must knowe the diseases of their States, the accidents that are past, the present and the future, and imploye Iustice as a drogue, the which is not good for them that bee sicke, and may profit others before the disease hath actually seized on them.

There remains one only consideration, that the Duke of Biron may do great seruice, and that it is not impossible but he may returne to the way of his first innocency. There is lesse harme not to beleuee it, then to beleuee it. Wee must not vpon an vncertaine that is to come, neglect the remedy of a present mischiefe. There is more trouble to absolue him and more danger to set him at liberty, then to put him to death. Hee is not likely to doe any more good : we can expect nothing but reuenge from his courage. There is no more any Furius Camillus who changed his exilie into a bonde vnto his Country that had banished him. Serpents seeme dead in winter, the cold keeps them from hurting, but when as the Sunne recouers his forces, they spend their venom. The prisoners bad intents might sleepe for a time, but it shold be to awake againe, and neuer to leaue the State at rest. He that can neuer profit by his vertue nor his loyalty, must profit by his example. These were the reasons of the Court, vpon the which by a generall consent a sentence of death was concluded against the Duke of Biron. There were fewe in condemning him but sayd, that it was fit to araigne la Fin, and giue warrant to apprehend him, and that it was impossible hee should be cleane from the flint which he had handled, & that if the affaires of Spaine (which is like vnto the Temple of Hecatompedon, the which goes forward in words and not in workes) had bin answerable to the vehemency of their affection, hee had sayd nothing. The King was aduertised thereof, who assured la Fin by his letters, that he would neuer endure that so great a seruice done vnto the Crowne, should be his ruine. It was reason, for if the Ancients did appoint Honours for Beastes that had done any seruice to the Commonweale, they should bee no lesse thankfull vnto a Gentleman that had saued his Country

A Prince cannot be liberal of his subiects blood.

Qui non veritate profit exemplo.

A Country. Whosoeuer discouers a Conspiracy against the sacred and inuolable person of the Prince, ought to bee rewarded by the publicke. So was Vindictus by the Romans. Princes loue them for a while that haue done some great villainies for their seruice, the which is soone turned into deadly hatred, lothing to looke on them, for that their presence doth reproch them with the wronging of their conscience. But this happens not to him who without any instigation of the Prince, but moued onely with his duty doth reueale a Conspiracy, choosing rather to faile in the office of a Friend, then in duty of a faithfull Subiect. The Chancellor concluding their opinions pronounced the sentence of death, and by graue reasons and great examples reconciled some fewe opinions for the apprehending of la Fin. Saying, that the enterprife of the prisoner condemned, was not in his head alone, that there were others, who hauing a desire to say some thing would retire themselves when they should see la Fin so intreated, who in the common opinion had deserued reward. And although that Mars would not haue the day which is giuen vnto him, to bee the last to one that had deferred the name of a second Mars, yet the shadow of death did enuiron him on Tweladay about Noone; seeing a great multitude of Parisians about Saint Anthomes gate, he then beleued that he should be a spectacle vnto them. The Lord of Vitry's Lieutenant freed him from this imagination, making him beleue that it was to see certaine Gentlemen fight. Herevpon (and of that which the heart doth alwaies Diuine in the like accidents, seeing more signes of death then of life) hee framed in his imagination infallible consequences of his death, sending the Seigneur of Baranton to intreate the Marquis of Rhosny to come vnto him, or if he could not, to be an intercessor vnto the King for his pardon. He answered that he was extremely greeued that hee durst not do the first, and had not meanes to effect the second. That the King was sorry that at his coming to Fontainebleau hee was obdurat and would not deliuer the truth, which tooke from him the meanes to saue his life, and for his friends to sue for him. This multitude did not runne to the gate without some occasion, they knewe that the sentence of death was giuen the day before: Certaine officers of the Court and the Executioner were seene enter in the Bastille, the Scaffold which should bee set vp at the Greue was made, but they were ill informed, for the King hauing commanded the Chancellor to send him the sentence, after he had giuen it in the Parliament, that he might let him vnderstand his pleasure touching the execution, Sillery who had carried it to S. Germaine, returned with letters, by the which (for the auoyding the ignominy of his death at the sute of his friends and for other considerations) his Maiesty was pleased to change the place of the execution, and to appointe that in the Bastille, which should haue bin done at the Greue. These letters being verified, on Wednesday morning the last of Iuly the Chancellor accompanied with the first President of the Court of Parliament, de Sillery and three Masters of Requests, & followed by some Officers of the Chancery, de Voyson register for Crimynall causes, & 6. others, came to the Bastille about 9. of the clock in the morning to let him heare the sentence of the Court. At his entring hee commanded them to make the Prisoner dine and not to aduertise him of his coming, remaying in a little Chamber nere the entry on the left hand, about an houre and halfe: where he resolved who should be sent for to assist at this execution, of whose names he made a list. He that apprehends death hath no desire to eate: yet hee set him downe, rose againe presently, and according to his vsuall maner went vnto a window which looked into the Court of the Bastille, where hearing the cries and lamentations of a woman, hee thought they were for him, & had this sad content to see they wept for him before his death. Soone after the Chancellor goes towards him, who crossing through the Court, the Duke of Biron espied him & cryed out, that he was dead. Yan come (sayd he) to pronounce my sentence, I am condemned vnjustly, tell my kins-folkes that I die an innocent. The Chancellor went on without any motion, commanding that they should bring him into the Chapel. The prisoner seeing him come a farre off, cryed out, Oh my Lord Chancellor is there no pardon? is there no mercy? The Chancellor saluted him and putts on his hat. The Duke of Biron continued bare, and hauing abandoned all the powers of his Soule to greefe greued might utter, reproching the Chancellor that hee had not had so great a desire to saue him as to condemne him. Hee added therunto certaine words, the recording whereof is prohibited, and the report punniftable. But Princes regard not the rayling of subiects against their Maiesty, the which returns alwaies fiō whence it came. The Duke of Biron knowing not whom he should challenge most for his misfortune, turned towards the Chancellor, and shaking him by the arme, sayd. You haue iudged me & God will absolue me, hee will lay open their Iniquities, which haue shut their eyes because they would not see mine innocency, you my Lord shall answere for this iniustice before him, whether I do somman you within a yeare and a day, I go before by the iudgement of men, but those that are the cause of my death shall come after by the iudgement of God. All which was deli- B

Hus sayd in dying. That those which had condemned him should answer a hundred yeares af- ter before God and him, and the Bohemians who preferred the Atthes of his bones and maintained his Doctrines, coyned money with this adiournement. But the Duke of Bi- rons assignation was vaine, for the Chancellor appeared not, but hath bin more heale- C full since then before. He found no means to enter into discours amidst the confusio of so many words which were like vnto a violent streame. Yet he interrupted him to tell him that he had need of Gods helpe & that he should recommend himselfe vnto him.
 He presently answered that hee had thought vpon God, and implored his aide to giue him patience against their iniustice, but neither he nor his Iudges had thought of it in condemning him. Passion (sayd the Chancellor) makes you to speake many things without any colour and against your owne Iudgement. There is not any man hath better knowe your merits then my selfe, and I would to God your offences had bin as much vnkowne as they haue bin dissembled. The knowledge thereof was so great and so perfect, as your Iudges haue bin more troubled howe to moderate your paine, then to D haue you punnished, they haue more labored to iustifie you then to condemne you.
 Whilest the Chancellor was speaking, the Duke of Biron turned towards Roissy Master of Requests, & asked him if he had also bin one of his Iudges, Roissy answered. My Lord I pray God to comfort you. My father loued you so intirely (replied the Duke of Biron) that although you were one of them that had condemned me I would forgieue you. And so returning to his discourse, he addrest himselfe vnto the Chancellor, who was saying some-thing vnto Voisin. I see well sayd he, what it is, I am not the most wicked, but I am the most vnfortunate. Those which haue done worse then I would haue done, are fauored. The Kings clemency is dead for me. Hee doth not immitate the examples of Cesar nor Augustus, or of those great Princes, who not only pardoned them that would haue E done ill, but euen them that did ill, & who were euer sparing of their blood, yea of that which was least esteemed, wherein can the King shew himself greater then in pardoning Clemency is a Kingly vertue. Euery one may giue death, but it belongs onely to Soue-reigns to giue life. And cruell that he is doth he not knowe well that he hath pardoned me. I had a bad desseigne, he granted me grace. I demand it againe, you may easily ad-uerise him, a shill will sooner returne. The Queene of England told me that if the Earle of Essex would haue humbled himselfe and sued for grace, hee would haue pardoned him. Hee grew obstinate and would neuer implore her mercy, taking from her all meanes to shew the effects. She like a generous Princeesse desiring to pardon him, euen him, it will nothing assure his affaires, but impair the reputation of his Iustice. Hee doth loose this daie a good Seruant, and the King of Spaine a great Enemy. I am not put to death for that I treated with him, my courage rayfed mee vp, and my courage ruines me.

 It is not lawfull for a man condemned to dispute of that which hath beene iudged against him. And therefore the Chancellor sayd, that hee should not torment himselfe any more against his Iudgement, that they had done him that Iustice which a Father is bound to pronounce against his owne Sonne if he had offended in the like sort. At that word, choller makes him to breake forth, saying. What Iustice? I was neuer heard but C once, I could not deliuer the fiftith part of my Iustification. What Iudgement vpon the testimony of the most wretched and most execrable man in the world, who neuer came neere me but with inchantments, nor went from me but he had enchanted me?
 He bit me by the eare, & made me to drinke enchanted waters, calling me his King, his Prince, his Lord. Hee cannot deny but hee made me to see an Image of waxe which spake these two words in Latin. Thou shalt die wicked King. If he hath this power ouer a sencelesse Image, what might he not do vpon me whole will he did tirannize vpon by his witch-craft, forcing me to do what he pleased. But la Fin sayes, that he knowes not what this Image meanes. If it be true, these words discover the Diuills pollecy, who D speaks the truth in his misery that trustes vnto his lies, and intangles him still with inscrutable ambiguities. So hee deceived Crasus when hee told him that the Riuier Nylus should loose a great power, meaning his, not that of Cyrus, against whome hee went to fight. So the Diuill ment not any other King then hee whome la Fin saluted by the name of King, calling the Duke of Biron his Prince and his King. At euery word nowe he vttered some execration against la Fin, taxing the Court of Iniustice, to haue condemned him vpon his accusation. The Chancellor sayd vnto him that the Court had considered aduisedly of his answers and his letters. It is true sayd the Duke of Biron. I haue written some, but there are some that by an odious wickednesse premeditated haue bene counterfet. Those that were of my hand writing were not my intention. I disauowed them when I sent them. There are some that can coun-E terfet letters so arteificially, as they that are charged therewith are confounded, and beleene they had written that which they neuer thought. The Marques of Vernueil confessed to haue written that which was not her hand nor euer in her thought, and when she had red the letter, she cryed out, that her hand had betrayed her Heart, hauing neuer any thought of that which was contrayned therein. The Chancellor would haue interrupted his discourse, but he prest him in such sort as there was no meanes to make any way. He spake of the Kings pardon which hee had granted him, as if he had relied vpon his word, not speaking any other assurances. He told what letters the King had sent him to perswade him to come, and the pollecy of the President Janin to drawe him therevnto, to deceiue him as hee sayd, calling him a Deceiuer, the aduice F of his friends constring him not to come, with many other vnecessary discourses.
 The Chancellor to interrupt him sayd, that the King demanded his Order, the Duke of Biron drawing it out of his pocket, deliuered it vnto him, protesting and swearing vpon the saluation and perill of his Soule that he had neuer broken the oth which he had made in taking it. It was true that he had affected Warre more then Peace. A make himselfe necessary, and to maintaine the reputation which he had gotten by the practise of armes. It seemes hee had not well obtained the articles of this Order, by the which no knight of the Holy ghost might take any Pension, Entertainment, or Money from a forraigne Prince, nor tie themselves to the seruice of any other person during the Kings life, but should faithfully reueale all which they knewe did import his Maiesties seruice. The Chancellor would haue had him to reade his sentence beseeched him not to intreate him with that rigor, that hee knewe what it did import, but the King should content himselfe with his Life, and suffer his Goods to go with his kinf-folkes, ending his paine with his death. The Chancellor sayd that he doubted not but the King like a Prince full of bounty would let his kinf-folkes knowe that hee had loved him. Although the losse of life is nothing comforted by the preservation of goods, yet this gaue him some consolation, so as the fume of his cholier was suddenly dispersed. The Chancellor sayd, That hee had brought two Diuines to comfort him and to prepare him for death. The prisoner sayd vnto them, That he was already prepared, and had his soule in that tranquillity, as the night before he had spoken with God, and that his gard had heard him laugh in his sleepe.

The Chancellor who had much forced his patience, sayd vnto him, wee will bidde you farre-well. What farre-well sayd the condemned? I will come and see you againe after dinner, answered the Chancellor, As he went forth he intreated him to graunt him the last consolation that remains for men that are dying, when they may haue their wills to passe after their deathes, and to suffer him to make his Testament. It was granted, and he disposed thereof with a spirit free from all perturbation. Hee remembered his seruants and friends, not forgetting the Baron of Lux whom hee lamented aboue all. He drewe three rings from his fingers and deliuered them to Baranton to giue vnto his Sister of Saint Blancart, desiring her to weare them in remembrance of him. Hee had about three hundred Crownes when hee was taken prisoner, a part he playd, the rest he gaue away to the poore. Eight or ten of his gard came to take their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. He gaue them Apparell Shirtes, Cloakes and all that he had in his Coffers. So when the table is taken away, they giue the meate that remains, to them that haue waigred. Garnier the Kings preacher and now Bishop of Mompel- lier, with Magnon Curat of Saint Nicholas of the field, presented themselves to comfort him, to take from him the violent fites which the opinion of his innocency did giue him, and to with-drawe him from the affections of the world. Voisin told him that it was the course of Iustice to reade the sentence, & that he must kneele downe before the Altar. Reade it saies hee, I wil be as suppl: as a gloue. It was read in these termes. The Pro-cessie beeing extraordinarily made, and examined by the Court and Chambers assembled, & by the Presidents and Councillors that were deputed, by letters patentes of the 18. and 19. of Iune, at the request of the Kings Attorney generall, against Charles Gontault of Biron, knight of both orders, Duke of Biron, Peere & Marshall of France, Gouver-nor of Bourgoigne, prisoner in the Bastille, accused of treason: interrogations, confessions & & denials, confronting of witnesses, letters, aduises & instructions giuen to the enemy, confessed by him, and all which the Attorney general hath produced. A sentence was giuen the 22. of this moneth, by the which it was decreed in the absence of the Peeres of France (being called) they should proceed to Iudgement, the conclusions of the Kings Attorney generall beeing giuen, and the prisoner beeing heard by the Court vpon the Crimes wherewith he was charged, al considered it was sayd. That the sayd Court had declared and did declare the sayd Duke of Biron guilty of heigh treason, for his conspiracies against the Kings person, enterprises against his Estate, & Treacheries and Treas-onies with his enemies, beeing Marshall of the Kings army. For reparation of which crimes, they deprived him of all his Estates, Honors and dignities, & condemned him to loose his head vpon a Scaffold at the Greue, declaring all his goods mouable & immouable wheresoeuer, to be confiscate vnto the King: the Seigneury of Biron to loose

A of the King to bee vnto the Crowne of France, decreed in the Court of Parliament the last day of Iuly 1602. and signed by Bellugre Chancellor of France, and Flen- ry Councillor in the Court and Reporter of the processe. Hee grewe into cholier thrice in the reading of the sentence: when they sayd that he had attempted against the Kings person, hee protested with great Imprecations that it was false. That he had neuer made any Cospiracy, that he had his head troubled with some enterprises of State, for that he would not liue idly in Peace, but giue some employment to men of war.
But it was about two and twenty monethes since hee had any thought of it; desiring that Voisin might raze that out of the sentence. When hee heard that hee should be executed at the Greue, he sayd he would not goe thither, but would rather be drawne with foure horses, and that it was not in all their powers to leade him. Voisin sayd, that they had provided for it, and that the King had done him the grace to change the place of his execution, hauing appointed it at the Bastille: What grace answered the Prisoner?
The third point of his sentence was, that hee was troubled for the reunion of the Duchie of Firon to the Crowne, the which hee sayd, could not be forfeited to the pre-iudice of the substitution of his Brethren, and that the King should be satisfied with his life. The Diuines after the pronouncing of the sentence spake more boldly vnto him of death, and to free himselfe of all worldly cares as he had done of his goods, and that he should haue no other thoughts but of his Soules health. Hee then grewe into cholier, swearing that they should suffer him in Peace, and that it concerned him only to thinke of his Soule, with the which they had nothing to do. It is the order in Cym-nall executions to deliuer the party condemned into the hands of the Executioner as soone as his Iudgement is read. They would haue done so with him: but Voisin went to speake vnto the Chancellor, to know if they should not distinguish him from other prisoners. The Chancellor was in doubt whether they should binde him or not. Hee asked Sillery what he thought, who vnderstanding by Voisin that the party condemned was well pacified, sayd, it was to be feared that in seeking to binde his hands they would cause him to breake the bonds of patience, and enter into newe furies, for that they which are in that distresse, are distempered for small matters. Yet the Chancellor would haue the aduice of the first President, who was in another Chamber, for that D he had dined before he came vnto the Bastille: Hee sayd that it was dangerous to suffer his hands free, and therefore they must binde him. Every one was of Sillerys opinion, who considered not so much what should be done as what might be done, for the Party condemned would neuer haue suffered himselfe to haue beene led bound to the place of executiō but in Fury & Dispaire. The Executioner (who sayd since that a young hangman and not experienced would haue died for feare) had beene in danger to endure that which hee would make him to suffer. In this liberty, his spirit was alwayes free in his thoughts for the last disposition of affaires. The Diuines intreated him to consider that he was no more what he had beene: that within an houre or two he should be no more: that he must leaue this life to liue for euer: that his Soule must go before the fearefull Throne of the liuyng God, to be rewarded with a more happy and perfect life then that which hee had past in this world, or condemned to infinite paines, in cōparison wherof, that which he should suffer was but a light pricking, in respect of the burning flames of the diuine Iustice. He then entred into the examinatio of his Conscience, in the which he remained aboue an houre. This action required an Humble, Penitent and a Contrite heart, and yet hee seemed much more carefull of worldly things, and of the affaires of his house, then of his Soules health, and as it were a yong apprentice in the first prayers of his Religion, praying vnto God not as a deuout Christian, but as a Soldiar, not as a religious Man, but as a Captaine, not as Moses or Elias, but like to Iosua, who, on horse-backe and with his sword in his hand prayed and commanded the Sonne to stand still. His confession beeing made, he walked vp and downe the Chappell, still casting out some exclamation for his Innocency, and some execration against la Fin, asking if it should not be lawfull for his brethren to cause him to be burnt.

1602. Hereupon Voisin comes, who tells him that the Chancellor and the first President were A very glad of the constant and generous resolution hee had to die, and that they would come presently to see him. He answered that he had beene long resolute, and that it was not the paine of death, but the manner that did amaze him. Whilest he attended them, there were many notes brought him, touching his affaires, whereunto he answered without trouble or passion. Hee recommended the payment of some debtes which he did owe to gentlemen, that had nothing to shew for it, and among others, to the Ambassador in England: when the Chancellor had dined, hee came to see him with the first President, & found that as a troubled water growes cleere being teled, so the time which he had given him to thinke of his affaires, had takē from him the violent agitations of his fantasie, & freed his heart from the feare of death. he cōmanded al B that were in the place to retyre, and they sat downe together about halfe an houre, but their discourse is unknowne. In the ende the Chancellor sayd vnto him, I should doe wrong vnto your courage, if I should exhort you vnto death, shee hath presented her-selfe vnto you in so many places, as it is not in her power to trouble the Constancie and Patience, whereunto I beleue you are disposed. You find it hard to die in the flower and vigour of your age, but if you consider that our dayes are lymited, and that they depend of the fore-sight of the Gouernor of the whole world, you will re-ceue this death as by the will of God, who meanes to retyre you out of this world for your owne good, before that some great and long miserie shall send you. As we may not desire a death which is farre off, so may we not reiect that which offers it selfe. No no answered the Partie condemned, labour not (my Lords) to fortifie me against the feare of death, these twentie yeares it hath not feared me, and knowing not where she would take mee, I haue expected her euery where. You haue given me fortie dayes to thinke vpon it, yet I could not beleue that beeing not in the power of my enemies to take away my life, I should be so miserable as to be seized on by death, with the consent of my friends. The King (said the Chancellor) hath cutt of al that might be shame-full and ignominious. He then asked him if hee would speake with any one. Hee sayd that he desired to see La Forse and Saint Blancart. They told him that they were not in the Cittie, but there was a gentleman of the Lord of Badesous, and after that he had demanded for Preuost (Comptroller of his house) and that they had answered him that he was gone three dayes before to a house of his in the Countrey, he then sayd, that hee D ought not to haue bene there, that he had all his blankes, adding therunto these wordes of Compassion. All the world hath abandoned mee. In these crimes friendship is dangerous, friends faule, and the disease is taken by acquaintance, as well as by infection. He is wise that knowes no man, nor no man knowes him. At these wordes the Chancellor and the first President tooke their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. He intreated them to re-ceue a good opinion of his life, by the assurance which he gaue at the point of death, that he had neuer attempted any thing against the King, & that if he would haue vnder-taken it, the King had not bene liuing three yeares since. The Chancellor went out of the Bastille with the first President and Sillery, & stayed in the Arceuall vntill the execution was done. The Duke of Biron intreated the Knight of the Watch to go after him, E & to request him that he would suffer his Body to be interred with his Predecessors at Biron, for although Nature hath prouided that no mā shal die without a Graue, yet mē thinke curiously thereof before they die, and imagine that as glory preserues the reputation of the life, so the Graue maintaines the remembrance of the Body. He that had seene him, would haue thought hee had not bin readie to die, so little care hee had of death, or els he promised to himselfe some vnexpected effects of the Kings mercy, or to escape by some miracle. There is no such deceit as imagination frames in these extremities, when shee flatters her selfe with vaine hope, imagining that God doth greater wonders, and that they haue scene a pardon come berixt the Executioners sword and the Prisoners necke. Voisin asked him if he pleased to say any thing else that might serue to discharge his conscience. The Preachers exhorted him not to conceale any thing, & to consider that they could not giue him Absolution but for what he should confes-

A loved his seruice, and had serued him with so great loue & obedience, neuer diuiding the one from the other, as he felt in his thoughts of death, those of his loue, to be so liue-ly and ardent, as he would not conceale any thing that he knew to be against his persion or State, for all the world, no nor for the assurance of his life hee would not speake any thing that was not true. He drew Voisin and his Confessors a part and whispered some thing vnto them, the which was presently written. Having continued with his Confessors halfe an houre (being neere five o' the Clocke) one came and told him that it was time to part, Go we, sayd he seeing I must. He then kneeled downe before the Altar, makes his prayer and recommends him selfe vnto God, before hee goes out of the Chappell. He asked if there were any one that belonged vnto the Marques of Rhoisy, B Arnaud was there, whome he willed to present his commendations vnto his Master, in remembrance not so much of him that went to die, as of his Kins-folkes which remained alieue, and to assure him that he held him for a good seruant to the King, and profit-table and necessary for his seruice, and that he was sorry he had not followed his Coun-cell. Hee knew one that followed the Duke of Mayenne, and intreated him to say vnto him, that if in his life he had giuen him some cause not to loue him, yet he desired him to beleue that hee died his seruant, and the Duke of Esguillons and the Earle of Som- merues his Children. Hee charged Baranton to deliuer his last words of loue and affection vnto his Bretheren, cōmanding them to keepe the faith which bound them vnto the Kings seruice, not to apprehend his misfortune, nor to come at Court vntill that C time had wome out the Skarres of his ignominious death. Hee intreated one of them that had garded him to go tel the Earle of Auvergne that he went to die without griefe, but for the losse of his friendship: that if God had giuen him a longer life hee would haue done him more seruice, beseeching him to beleue that he had sayd nothing at his Arraignment that might hurt him, if it were not that hee had more want then bad meaning. The Count of Auvergne receiued this far well as from a true friend, & with a feeling worthy of his friendship, he intreated him to leaue him a bafe Childe of his the which he would bring vp with his owne. Going out of the Chappell the Executioner presented himselfe vnto him. He asked Voisin what he was. It is (sayd he) the Executioner of the sentence. Retire thy selfe (sayd the Duke of Biron, touch me not vntill it be time. And D doubting least he should be bound he added, I will go freely vnto death, I haue no hands to defend my selfe against it, but I shall neuer be sayd that I die bound like a Thiefe or a Slave, and turning towards the hangman, hee sware that if he came neere him he would pull out his throat. Hee could not endure the sight of the Executioner: He had reason, for they torment the body, as Diuills be Executioners of the Soule. And although they be Men and the Instruments of Iustice, yet they are held execrable, and had no dwelling house allowed them in Rome by the Censors Lawe. The two Preachers led him downe, intreating him to resist his impatience, which did but distemper his minde, and made him loath to leaue the place which hee could not hold against his will. Coming into the Court he went five or six paces without speaking a word, but ha, ha, ha. He cast his E eyes vpon the Lieutenant Ciuill in whose house la Fin was lodged, to whome he sayd, I am your friend, beware you be not abused with Sorcerers and Magicians, if you free not your selfe of them, you will repent it. They had made a Scaffold in a corner of the Court of the Bastille before the portall going into the Garden, six foote heigh and somewhat longer there were five steps to go vnto it. There were no Ornaments, no Tapistery, no Distinction. The most stately death is not the least troublesome, the greater the preparation is the more remarkable is the infamy. It is no great honor to kneele vpon a vel-uet Cushion, vpon a Scaffold spred with Tapistery, & to haue by him an Executioner clad in black veluet, and Crimfon Silke, with the sword of gold of Helogabalus. The death which is least ceremonious is the best.

F The beholders were some at the windoes, some in the Court. There were the Prouost of Marchants, foure Sheriffes, three or foure Masters of Requests, some Presidents of the Chambers of Accounts, and some Counsellors, the Lieutenants Ciuill & Cry-minal, & the kings Attorney general. The Duke of Biron coming to the Scaffold kneeled vpon the first step, praying in fewe words, and his eyes lift vp to Heauen. Hee was

He cast a furious looke vpon the Executioner. Voisin perswaded him that it was an other, but he knew him well, saying, that they sought to deceive him, but he commanded him to stand by, and when it were time, he would call for him. He threw downe his hat, and cast his hand-kercher to a boy, and presently called for it againe to vse it, seeming in this act, that he had not the courage to looke vpon death with open eyes. He put of his dubler, & cast it to the same boy, but the Executioners man got it, and kept it. The Executioner offered him a cloth to put before his eyes, the which he reiected, saying, That if hee toucht him, but to giue him the stroake of death, hee would strangle him. Hee sayd vnto the souldiars which garded the Port (shewing them his naked brest) that he should be much bound vnto him that would shoote him with a B Musket: what a pittie is it sayd he, to die so miserably, and of so infamous a stroake? They might see by his hollowe eyes, that his thoughts were disordered. At these wordes the teares fell from the souldiars eyes. All those of his profession sware by his Spirit, & by his good Angell, as the Ancients did by that of their Prince. The poorest souldi- ar was cherished by him, at the least he had some good words to assure him of his good liking. The Hargubuziers did wound him at the Heart, through the extreame compas- sion they had of him. So were the souldiars of Eumenes, moued when they see him bound and manacled intreating them to kill him. He asked if there were no pardon, and directing his words to the standers by, he sayd, that he had made his Soule ready to present it before the face of God, but he tooke pittie of the Kings soule, who put him to C death viuently, that he died an innocent, and that this death was the recompence of his seruice: Voisin sayd vnto him, That it was the manner to reade the sentence He was an- gry that they would make him to feele death, and to die so often before his death, for he fealt himselfe to die cruelly in the repetition of the crimes of his condemnation, be- ing sufficient that they had brought him thither where he was ready to obey, and that they which did see him were not ignorant of the cause. When as the Register answered him that it could not be otherwise, hee gaue him leaue: but vnderstanding the words: That he had attempted against the Kings person and State, hee sayd that it was false. That God was his Iudge, that he would be depriued eternally of his grace, if it were true, that for two and twenty monethes past he had neuer any thought of it, and that D the King had pardoned him. Hee talked all the while that Voisin red his Iudgement, so as neither the one nor the other could bee vnderstood, the Auditors not knowing to whom to giue eare. The party condemned protesting still, and coniuring the Assistants to remember that these two and twenty monethes he had not attempted any thing a- gainst the Kings seruice. No man doth at any time condemne himselfe. You shall see few of these great Spirits, that die by their owne confessions, although they be found guiltie. Some confesse the Fact, but they hold it no Cryme, as that yong gentleman who was one of them that murdered the Duke of Milan, being readie to receiue the stroake, he cried out, that the Death which he suffered was troublesome, but his Reputation should bee euerlastingly glorious.

Stantem im-

His Iudgement being read, the Preachers perswaded him to call to God for helpe, and not to thinke any more on Earth, but to yeeld his Soule to the immortal dispositi- on of the Creator, and to leaue his bodie to that which Iustice had decreed. He asked what he should doe, and takes his hand-kercher with the which he blinds his eyes, at- king the Executioner where he should set himselfe: He answered him, there my Lord, there. And where is that? Thou seest that I see nothing, and yet thou shewest mee as if I did see plainly: and therewith being in choller, he pulled away his hand-kercher to see: He blinded his eyes againe, and for that it is a kind of grace to be soone dispatcht, and a great crueltie to languish in the expectation of a paine, he commanded the Ex- ecutioner to make an end. He desired to die standing, according to the aduise of Ves- pasian. The Executioner answered him that hee must kneele, that hee might doe no- thing out of Order. No no, said the Duke of Biron, if thou canst not doe it at One, giue Thirtie. I will not stirre. They prest him to kneele, and hee obeyed, willing the Execu- tioner

A sooner to dispatch, then he start vp sodainly againe, casting his eyes vpon the Execution- 1602. ner, and looking vpon the standers by, hee asked if there no mercy: It was imagined, that either hee would haue layd hand vpon the Executioners sword, or that hee presumed that when he should be readie to receiue the fatall stroake they would bring him his pardon, and that the King would doe him no other harme then feare him, as Papirus Curfor did one of his souldiars for breaking of his ranke. The Executioner in- treated him to suffer him to cut his heire. At that word he grew into choller againe, he vnbandd himselfe, and sware that if he toucht him hee would strangle him. You may see in two persons, two extreame passions. Feare retyred the Executioner within him- selfe. Choller transported the Duke of Biron beyond himselfe. The one trembled for B feare, the other for rage. Voisin sayd vnto him, that he had too much care of his bodie, which was no more his owne. He turned to him in choller with an oath, saying, I will not haue him touch mee, so long as I shall bee liuing: If they put mee into choller, I will strangle halfe the company that is here, and will force the rest to kill mee, I will leape downe if you thrust me into dispaire. His colour did rise, and shewed a distemperature in his face. Those that were vpon the scaffold went downe. The Executioner remayned amazed, fearing death more then he that was to die.

He swears and growes
into choller.

But this choller preuailed nothing, it was like vnto Ctesiphon, to kicke against the Moiles heeles. Restie horses get nothing but spurring, they are neither freed from their burden, nor from their iourney, hee must resolue to goe this way, the which he must C passe at length. Voisin intreated the Preachers to goe vp againe, and to pacifie him, fear- ing least he should fall into dispaire, for his Soule being much troubled, with the vio- lence of so tragicall an end, (entring into these furious motiues) was subiect to great distemperatures. They goe vp againe, and speake some good wordes vnto him in his eare, the which doth temper his furious rage, and calmes the choller which the Execu- tioners presence did thrust him into: Hee had alwayes liued in Warre, he could not die in Peace. All men found these furious passions strange in the last act of his life, the which required a great constancie of mind, and a perfect Iudgement to know God, and to call to him for mercy, and to pray him to intreat his Soule more fa- uourably then Iustice had done his Bodie. Hether to they beleueed, that although hee were entring into death, yet hee thought not to die, and that hee would cease D vpon the Executioners sword. Sodenly hee resolues to free this passage, and ha- uing receiued his absolution, hee sayd, My God, my God, my God take pittie on mee. Then turning to the Executioner, hee takes the binder that was in his hand, trusses vp his haire behind, and binds it vpon his fore-head, and with his hand-kercher hee binds his eyes, and so kneeles downe. The Preachers comfort him in his last resolution, assuring him that his Soule was readie to see God, and to bee par- taker of his glory in Heauen. I sayd he, Heauen is open for my Soule. And this done he bends downe his head, presenting it as willingly vnto the sword, as Agis did his vn- to the halber, saying vnto the Executioner. Strike, Strike, oh Strike. This was to die in E commanding, and to command in dying.

The Executioner hauing seene him to rise, and to vnblinde himselfe thrise, that in turning towards him being not bound, hauing the sword in his hand, hee might wrest it from him, thought that there was no way to execute him but by surprise, and therefore hee sayd vnto him that hee must say his last prayer to re- commend his Soule vnto God, intreating the Preachers that were gone downe to caule him to say it. At which wordes the Executioner made a signe to his man to reach him his sword, with the which hee cut of his head, euen as he was speaking. The blow was so sodaine, as few men perceiued it, the Head leaped E from the scaffold to the ground. The Preachers prayed for the happie departure of the Soule, from so unhappie a Bodie, the which was presently stripped into his shirt, and couered with a sheete. His heart panted, as if in rising against the Head, it had sayd as Apolodorus thought that his did when hee drempt that one did heu

He cuts off his head.

1602. hewe it in peeces. It is for thee that I suffer. This Head full of the fumes of Ambition, was the cause of the Hearts death. The Executioner stroke him so heigh above the Nape of the Necke, as he glaunced vpon his Iawe-bones, and left a great rube of hayre on his Necke. Being dead, hee shewed Choller in his Countenance, as they write of the Souldiars which died at the Battell of Cannas. Euery one departed, commending the Kings Iustice, and lamenting the misery of so Valiant a Man, becoming that of long time they should not see his equall. His Kinsfolkes would thinke themselves happy, if the Glory of his Life, might wipe away the Infamy of this Death, if the shining of his first actions, were not obscured with the Darknesse of the last; that for a recompence of all his Seruices which haue made him so famous, they might obtaine the fauour that they would neuer speake of him. But there is no Lawe of Forgetfulness, to deface the memory of that which hath bene, and of that which is. About nine of the Clocke at night, he was carried to S. Pauls Church and buried in the midst of the Body, before the Pulpit, the Celestins hauing refused to geue him buriall, hauing had no permission nor commandment for it. He was not distinguished from others by his Funerall Pompe, nor by the number of Ensignes (like vnto that Great Captaine at Granado), but by the Holy water which the Parsons did cast hourly vpon his Graue. Such was the ende of the Duke of Biron. There is no Calme but hath a Storme: one would haue said to haue seene him at the height of his prosperities; That he had fixed a Naylor on Fortunes wheele, that it might not turne, and yet he is sodainly cast downe. There past but one night, betwixt his Glory and his Ruine. This Flower being so sodainly blowne, the first Northern winde did wither it, and carry it away. His Honours and Greatnesse were the meanes to ruine him, like vnto Abolons long Hayre, by the which hee was hanged. King Lewis the 11. did alwayes say; That Pride carried Ruine behinde him, A Heart which knowes from whence the good comes which it inioyeth, is alwayes an enemy to Pride. So there is but a moment betwixt Glory and Ruine. Great Trees are long in growing, but are rooted vp in an instant. And it is true, if the Duke of Biron had had a Brayne, he had not lost his Head, and had not brought it into the handes of his Princes Iustice, whom hee had so much offended.

A comparison and the Duke of Biron.

His Credit and how hee was esteemed.

This Marshall had goodly parts, communicable to fewe, his Valour was admirable, and happy in all his encounters; of an inuincible Courage, infatigable and neuer tired with any toyle, continuing ordinarily fiftene dayes together on Horse-backe. He was not inclined to Voluptuousnesse, nor much to the loue of Women, sober ynough, the which began to quench that furious humour, as Intemperancy & greatnesse increased, or that Rest did moderate his boyling passions. He was extremely Vaine-glorious, yea sometimes he would refuse his meate, and content himselfe with little to feede his Fantasie with Glory and Vanity. He was of a meane stature, Blacke, reasonable grosse, hollow eyd, and rough in speech and conuersation. He was aduenturous in War, Ambitious beyond all measure. The excesse of his Ambition made him to braue it without iudgement. He became so presumptuous, as he thought that the King, nor France could not subsist without him. He was become ill-tongued, speaking ill of all the Princes, threatening the Parliaments, and the Officers of Iustice, some with death, and to dispossesse others of their places. He was aduanced from the meane to the highest degrees of Honours of a simple Souldiar, hee became a Captaine, then a Colonell, afterwards Admirall and Marshall, and in the ende Lieutenant of the Kings Armies, and in his Heart he aspired to be Duke of Burgundy, Son in Lawe to the Duke of Sauoy, and Nephew to the King of Spaine. If Sylla were Reformed, Cruell, and Bloudy, he yeelded nothing to all men together: If he were Valiant, this man exceeded him by ten degrees, and all the Romaine Princes together. Their Actions and their ends were almost alike, but that Sylla died after he had vanquished: this before he could vanquish, and in the midst of his Course, did feelee the Vengeance of Gods wrath. Howsoeuer he had wonne the Souldiars hearts, to whom hee gaue all liberty: he purchased credit with them that had neuer seene him

Fortune.

For they that had seene and felt him wished him at the Indies) and made Strangers admire his valour: the Constable of Castille in the Franche-Comté, the Archduke at Amiens, and the Marquis of Waranbon in Artois, whom he made to pay forty thousand Crownes for his ransom, with many Spaniards which he caused to be hanged sodainly, for that they had called him Baron. Moreouer the Kings exceeding fauours, the prayes wherewith he did publiquely honour him: his admirable fortune, his coming to the restoring of the last ruines of the State, like to an other Camillus to deliuer the Capitoll, had made him not onely famous throughout all Europe, fearefull to all the neighbours, but necessary for France. Behold a man that was happy, full of content, which held Fortune captiue, withall her treasures: he commanded the felicities of this world, he had Glory, Honour, Riches, & those gifts which Fortune imparts to her darlings, He was raised to the top of Fortunes wheele, but he fell, for he that gouerns the Helme and all her motions, could no longer endure his insolency and vanity. Sequitur superbus vltor a tergo Deus. The causes of his ruine are infinite; the contempt of piety is the chiefe: this ground taken away, all vices abound, and as the Tertian said to King Atræus, O Prince, follow the infallible way of Piety, & your Scepter shall be durable: for wher as Faith & Holines hath no place, there is no happines; the reason is, for that without God we hold all things indifferent, the Law folly, Iustice frensie, and Faith a fantasie; we hold the words of vertue & vice to be idle, wheras the feare & trust in God, limits our passions & insatiable desires, so as gouerning our actions by a iust proportion we cannot erre. He was oftentimes seene to lye at the Masse, & to laugh at the Reformed Religion, with whō he had bin bred vp from his infancy. For at the age of eight yeares the Lady of Brisambourg his Fathers sister being of the reformed Religion did so affect him for his actiue disposition, as she demanded him of his Mother, the which she granted, & frō that time she made him her onely heire. Vntill the age of 16 yeares he was called Charles of Gontault (for then he had an elder brother which died since at the Duke of Alançons voyage into Flanders) & bred vp at Brisambourg nere vnto S. Jean d'Argely, where he was nothing giuen to his booke, but wholly inclined to Armes, for which consideration, his Father the Marshall Biron, a Martiall Man, & then a Catholike, tooke him frō his Aunt & led him for a while with him through the Countreies of Xaintonge, Aulins & Angoulmois, where he caused him to be instructed in the Catholike Religion: but vpon false principles which he did learne of some Courtiars, he did often mocke at all Religion. The second cause of his ruine was the alteration of his Fortune. After the death of his elder Brother, his father caused him to be called Baron of Biron & brought him to Court, where at the first he had a quarrell with the Lord of Carency, son to the Earle of la Vauguion, the which was ended by a Combat of three against three, Biron, Laigne & Lenissac of the one side, fluc Carency Estissac and la Bastie: their quarrell grew for the heyer of Caumont, which either of the affected in marriage, yet neither of the had her. The Duke of Espernon got his pardō, the which was confirmed through the credit which his father had the in Court. Some say that being thus in trouble, he went disguised like a Carrier of Letters, vnto one la Brosse a great Mathematician whō they said to be skilful in casting of Natiuities, to whom he shewed his Natiuitie, drawn by some other. And dissembling it to be his, he said it was a Gentlemans whom he serued & that he desired to know what end that man should haue. La Brosse hauing re-versed this figure, said vnto him, That he was of a good house, & no elder then you are, said he to the Baron, asking him if it were his? the Baron answered him, I will not tell you: But tel me (said he) what his Life, his meanes, & end shall be. This good old man who was then in a little Garret which serued him for a Study, said vnto him, My Son, I see, that he whose Natiuitie this is shall come to great Honours, by his industry and Military valour, and may be a King, but there is a CAPUT ALGOL which hinders it: And what is that (said the Baron of Biron?) Aske me not (said la Brosse) what it is. No (said the Baron) I must know it. In the end he sayd vnto him; My Son, it is, that he will do that which shall make him loose his Head. Wher vpon the Barō (as they report) did beat him cruelly, & hauing left him halfe dead he went downe, & carried away the Key of the Garret dore, whereof he bragged whē he was gone. They say he had conference with one Casir, who was a Magitian at Paris who 1602. who told him That onely a backe-blow of the Bourguignon would keepe him from beinge a King. He remembered this prediction beinge a Prisoner in the Bastille. And increased one that went to visit him, to learne if the Executioner of Paris were a Bourguignon, and hauing found it so, he said, I am a dead man. During these last Ciuill Wars, his Father beinge Cominander of the Kings Army, of a young Baron hee was become a made a Capraine and Marshall of the Campe. After his Fathers death at Epernay, he was Generall and Admirall of France, then Marshall and Lieutenant of the Kings Armyes: the defeat of the Spanish succors at Laon, with his employes in Burgundy and Picardy, made the King lo to loue him, as he onely was in credit: there remained nothing but to vse his happinesse modestly. Doublelesse hee did great seruices to the King and to the Crowne, but he was rewarded with great fauours, and aduanced to the greatest Dignities and Honours of the Crowne, the which if he could haue vied temperately euen in the height of his Fortune, he had beene too happy. He reported that his Father sayd vnto him seeing his haughty disposition; Baron I would aduise thee when a Peace shalbe made, to go and liue priuately at thine owne house, else thou must leaue thy head at the Greue. All Princes that were allied to the Crowne of France reioyced at the discouery of the Duke of Birons Treason. The Queene of England, and the King of Scotland sent their Ambassadors vnto the King to congratulate that God had so happily preuented this last Conspiracy. The King of Spainne did the like by Taxis. The Archduke layde all the blame vpon the Count of Fuenteles. The Duke of Sauoy sent the Count of Viesque vnto the King, as well to obserue howe the Duke of Birons death had beene taken in Court, and in that Great City whereas there was diuersity of Humors and Opinions, as to excuse him from the Imputation which was layd vpon him to be the first Architect of this Conspiracy.

Birons of war after the death of the Duke
of Biron.

The Ambassadors of England, Scotland and Sauoy were receiued of one day at Montceaux. The King in receiuing of them made a great difference, for hee receiued them not with one Countenance. The last was not vied like vnto the first; the King leaning vpon a Window, shewed by his gesture, that he was not pleased with his excuses, and that words alone could not repaire so bad effects, nor make him beleue that the Duke of Sauoy had not beene an Actor to corrupt the Duke of Biron. The Dukes Ambassador made his excuse with a great Grace and Boldnesse, although it be a very hard thing to discourse of a subiect to one, that can giue no beleefe vnto it. The Count of Viesque passing through Lions, visited the Gouvernor, and gaue him a Letter from his Maister, the which he sent vnto the King who was very well pleased with his proceeding, and writ vnto him in this sort. It was not needefull to send me this Letter, but onely to giue mee a newe Confirmation of your loyalty, which I hold so assured, as it needed neither that, nor any other. But the wisest do alwayes obserue the ancient formes, whereof that is one of the principall, not to see nor heare any thing from forraigne Princes without the priuaty and permission of his Maister. The King parted from Montceaux to go to Paris, where he dispatched the Ambassadors. That of Sauoy came to his Maister being newly returned from Vercel, where he had visited the Duke of Saxony E brother passing into Italy. He presented him with eight Horses richly furnished, and a Hat-band with a Iewell esteemed at twelue thousand Crownes. Soone after hee went to Riuoly for his pleasure of Hunting, leading D'Albigny with him to whom hee made shewes of extraordinary Loue. Mens coniectures were not able to peece into the secrets of that which they treated of together; but they will burst forth before the yeare shall end. The Count of Viesque came to Riuoly in the beginning of October. Euery man said at Thurin that his Ambassage was Gracious, and that the King was well pleased with that which the Duke of Sauoy would haue him beleue, yet all Sauoy was full of Souldiars and no man knew howe they should be employed. Some sayd that the Duke of Birons death would breed a newe storme in France, but all the choller and threats of them that repined thereat, was but a fantastick lightning. The Count of Fuenteles would haue done his best to haue bred a storme: his spirit which hath no rest but in exercise, thinking (with Teres father to Sistales) that nothing doth disturbing

A disting with him from the rest of his Maisters seruants but War, was so much discontented for this death, as he could not sleepe. He did meditate of reuenge, and the King was well aduertised thereof. It was thought that vnder colour of passing a newe army ouer the Alpes, hee would discouer some desseine, and the King was aduertised from many parts, that the Cittie of Lions was not the last, nor the least in his chollenke thoughts. That three and twentie companies of Spaniards (in the which were at the least three thousand men) had past the Mountaines, and were disperced in Sauoy: that the Duke of Sauoy had at Romilly fine hundred men, vnder the Regiment of Calaisers, and at Ariffy 1500. Neapolitains; that they attended some Lanqueneers: that neere vnto Genoa their were thirtie Companies of Spaniards landed: and that they fortified B Saint Genis (against the last Treatie of Peace) a fit place to execute any desseine vpon Lions or Vienne. The King therefore foreseeing that if they fought any aduantage vpon France, it should be rather for Lions then any other place, hee therefore lodged in the Bastions of Saint John and Saint Clair fine Companies of the Regiment of Bourg L' Espinasse, and those of Nereftan, at Montlael and Seiffel.

The opinions of this new Armie were as diuers as their desseins were secret, yet it seemed that the Duke of Sauoy feared, least his Countie should be force Pagaine by the Kings army, and that hee should not haue so good a composition as the first, and therefore he provided for all his places in Sauoy, but this hatched another great desseine whereof we will speake in the end of this yeare. The King was much troubled to search into the depth of the Duke of Birons conspiracie. La Fin was not acquainted with the last resolutions, the partie condemned, would neuer discouer his Complices. All this practise was well knowne to the Baron of Lux, who came vnto the King vpon the assurance of his Maisties word to goe and come freely: yet hee was aduised not to approach neere vnto the Court of Parliament, who would not intreat him more mildly then they had done the Duke of Biron. seeing hee had beene imbarcked with him in the same vessel, and to consider that Princes promise any thing, to discouer a Treason, but they neuer trust the Traitors, and if happely they fauour them for a time, the hatred which followes after, is more violent and irreconciliable. That they vse men, as a Countreiman doth his Bees, when they haue drawne out the Honey and Waxe, D they chase them away with Fire, and Smoake. The King was so well satisfied with that which the Baron of Lux had sayd vnto him (hauing talked long with him) as entering into his Carosse, hee tould the Count Saksions; and the Cardinall of Loyenze, that hee would not for two hundred thousand Crownes; but haue spoken with the Baron of Lux. His pardon past in the Parliament at Paris, and hee was receiued in that of Dijon, with the same honours hee had before, and his charge of Lieutenant in the gouernment of Bourgogne, and of the Countie of Bresse. His wife-dome did conduct him in a stoumie Sea, to a safe Port, and made him to auoyd some dangers, whereas any other would haue lost both Card and Compasse. The greatest indiscretion which the Duke of Biron had committed, (next to the giuing E care to the promises and perswasions of Strangers) was that hee had writen his intentions, and had imparted them to another. It is a Maxime in matters of Conspiracie, not to commit any thing to writing, but all must goe by mouth. They could not haue condemned the Duke of Biron, but by his owne Letters. And of all those of whome hee spake in his Letters, there was noe thing found of theirs in writing. Letters serue indifferently for an assurance of the faith that is giuen, and for a prooue of infidelitie.

Hee would die with that content, that none of his friends should be toucht but himselfe. Hebert his Secretarie indured the Racke, and his patience did iustifie him, but the Kings words were a more violent torture vnto him, drawing the truth from him, the which hee would not confesse vnto the Court. The Baron of Fontauelles, (who was found to haue had intelligence with the Duke of Biron) was broken vpon Racke, and the wheele by the decree of a great Councell. Mem-barrat Gouvernor of Rennes was committed to prison. Such as had knowne him during the last troubles full of resolution 1602. solution and affection for the reducing of Brittaine to the Kings obedience, lamented A his misfortune. The Earle of Auvergne continued two monethes in the Bastille after the execution of the Duke of Biron. The King set him at liberty and receiued him into fauour, after three or foure daies that he had purged himselfe and discharged him into conscience to the Chancellor, the Marquis of Rhospny and to Sillery. Hee grewe presently familiar with the King, as if hee had neuer bin sequestred from his presence, wherein appeared his Maiesties good nature and his generous spirit, which doth neuer remember any Iniuries. But the Duke of Bouillon considering what had beene done in the Bastille vpon the person of so great a Captaine, would not trust to this great mildnesse, although he had as great prooffe thereof as any other. The King sent for him, and he desired to iustifie himselfe in the Chamber at Castres. The King let him vnderstand B that the pretext which hee tooke to flie vnto the Chamber at Castres for Iustice, was without ground, for he was not called into question, and when he should do it, it could not bee therefore that hee depended not of that Iurisdiction, neyther could they take knowledge thereof without Commission from his Maiesty. He attended not to vnderstand his pleasure more particularly by the President Caumartin, whome hee resolved to send vnto him, but tooke the way to Genoua, and so to Heidelberg. The Subiect may neuer capitulate with his Prince, but if necessity doth require it, it must not be betwixt two Barres, like to the Constable of S. Paul, but as farre off as he can.

The Duke of Bouillon beeing in his Viconte of Turenne, when as the King sent for him, he answered him with this letter. Sir, hauing vnderstood by that of your Maiesties owne hand of the 18. of this moneth, that I had beene accused by those which C had beene examined in Councell vpon the Conspiracies of the Duke of Biron, and that you commanded me to repaire presently to Court to iustifie my selfe, I sent away him presently that came, with answere to your Maiesty that I would followe instantly, the which I had done, if I had not receiued certaine Intelligence who were my accusers. The which made mee to change this resolution, and humbly to beseech your Maiesty to consider that the Treacheries and Disloyalties against your Person and State are so fully proued against my Accusers, as it disables them to accuse mee, and much lesse to D condemne mee. They haue not, nor cannot haue but lying tongues in their accusations, the which hauing sayled them in the execution of their intention (being preuented by your Maiesties happines and wisdom) they employ them to make you suspect the second Officer of your Crowne, and your house-hold seruant, who hath neuer sought any glory in this world, but what proceeds from your Maiesties grace & fauor, & who hath so long serued you. It is to bee presumed that hauing an intent to hurt mee, they haue incensed your displeasure against mee, by the most horrible crimes they could inuent. They would make mee the Instrument of that which they haue promised to the E enemies of your Estate to preiudice you. And seeing they cannot now suborne any others, they will accuse them who in the like affaires haue made prooffe of their Innocencies, by so many circumstances, as it is not to bee beleueed they would haue any thought to the contrary. They do ill acknowledge your mercy, to continue still culpable, chaging only their offence. Seeing that since they are become false witnesses I will say vnto you my Lege, as the Psalmist sayd vnto God. Lord come not neere mee, untill I bee fortised. I must confesse that I feare your Countenance (hauing admitted such men to accuse me) seeing that your Maiesty demands my Iustification, the which hath F retayned me, nor that my conscience doth accuse me of any fault that is worthy of such an examination. Seeing it doth import your seruice, it is requisite I should satifie your Maiesty, your Realme & mine Honor, and free them of my Relligion from the scandal which they should receiue, if my crime were not punished, & mine Innocency known. For the attayning wherof, I assure my selfe that your Maiesty would not deprive me of the liberty, which all your subiects of the Relligion enioye, and the rather, for that no Iudges can be more interested in these affaires, seeing the question is of the decaye of your Realme to augment that of Spaine, where in all your subiects haue one comon losse; but those of the Relligion (whereof the Chambers do consist) haue a more particular: the which they esteeme more deare then their liues, which is the losse of their exercise

A exercise. They will therefore bee seuerer Iudges rather then milde. If they shall finde mee guiltie, they will hate me more then any other, from whom they did least expect it. I most humbly therefore beseech your Maiesty, to send my Accusers & Accusations, thinking the imputation which is layd vpon me heauie, & the time tedious, vntill your Maiesty may be fully satisfied of mine Innocencie, for the speedy effecting whereof I will attend at Castres the Iustification of my fault or Innocencie. Iudging that the time which I should haue spent in going to your Maiesty, would haue but prolonged the affliction of my Soule remayning accused, seeing that your Maiesty was to send mee backe to the Chambers, to condemne or absolue me, being the Iudges which your Edict hath giuen me. That it would therefore please you to releue my minde B speedily in giuing mee the means to make my Innocencie knowne, and that by this prooffe you may rest assured of my faithfull seruice, and I of your fauour, the which shall bee about all things desired of your most Humble, most Obedient, and most Faithfull Subiect, and Seruant.

Henry de la Tourne

The King caused the Prince of Ginulle to be committed to the Duke of Guise his brother. Sillery examined him very carefully, his Maiesty relying vpon his wisdom and integrity. He advertised the Gouernours of Prouinces why he did it, vsing these words. I haue committed my Nephew the Prince of Ginulle vnto my Nephew the Duke of C Guise his brother, for that he had rashly and indiscreetly giuen care to certaine propositions, that were made vnto him against my seruice: I will hold him in the same guard vntill that matters be made plaine. But I assure my selfe it concerns him only, wherein those of his house haue no share, neither is there any one named or comprehended with him, whereof I thought good to aduertise you. The King hauing since bin satisfied of the truth, he returned againe into fauour. There came 15. or 16. Deputies out of Daulphine to Paris. This Prouince was giuen to the Crowne of France, by Humbert Prince of Daulphiné, vpon condition, that the Kings eldest Son, (the presumptiue heire of the Crowne) should be soueraigne thereof from his birth. Hauing made great ioy for this blessing, and to see that which they had not seene since King Charles the 8, they made D choise of some out of the three Estates of the Country, to go & performe their first duties of subiection, & to know their Soueraigne Lord. Ierome of Villars Archbishop of Vienne, was the cheefe of this Ambassage, the which he gouerned and ended happily, and with honor. Hauing done their duties to the King and Queene, and let them vnderstand the charge which he had from the States of the Countrey with the other Deputies, hee was led to S. Germans, to see their new Prince, who was vnder a cloth of Estate in his Cradle, vpon a little bed. The Count Soissons Gouernour and Lieutenant generall of Daulphiné, his Gouvernesse and his Nurse were by him. The Archbishop of Vienne spake vnto him standing, al the rest kneeled of one knee. The substance of which speech was. That the ioy of France had beene infinite by his birth, foreseeing that her E felicitie should be imperfect without it, and that the blessing of Peace could not continue without his Birth, who should bee the death of all pretexts of Ciuill warres, but your Prouince of Daulphiné hath farre greater cause of ioy, for that it feesles in effect, that which the rest of the Realme hath but in hope. Those which haue beleueed that felicitie could not be in the infancie of a Child, seeing it requires a continuance of years and a constant knowledge of virtue and fortune, ment it not by Kings Children, and about all of the first borne of the Crowne of France, at whose first birth wee see all the fauours raigne vpon his head, the which Heauen can powre vpon them whome it will make happy. The same day my Lord, that you saw the light, the Sunn did salute you F a great Prince, and the Sonne of a great King, you are borne our Soueraigne Lord, and wee are become your faithfull vassalls, and most humble Subiects, so as this Prouince which amidst so many afflictions hath sighed about a hundred yeares, for the day when it should see borne that sacred bud of the Royall flower, holds it the greatest point of glorie and felicitie, not to know any power more absolute and soueraigne then 1602. then yours, and to obey you before that you know what it is to command. This „Cradle (my Lord) about the which the Eternall Providence (which hath a speciall „care ouer this Realme, and hath appointed his Angells for your grad) is the „Throne wherein wee adore in your lyuing Image the inuisible Maistie of the li„uing God. The rocking of this Cradle hath seled the filicitie of France which be„gan to bee shaken by furious and dangerous attempts both without and within.

 „It is an extreme greefe vnto vs that the lawe of this Cradle, will not suffer vs to heare „you, & make vs so happie as to vnderstand you. And if you vnderstand not but by the „Laguage of Infants, which be Tears, you shal knowe the affection of your peoples Haies, „by the tears of Ioy which fall from their eyes, praising God that it hath pleased him to „giue them a Prince issued from the first Crowne of the world, who carries in his Heart „the generosity of his Father, and in his eyes the sweetnes of the Mother. A Prince „which in greatnes of courage and in reputation of braue and immortal Actions, shall „exceed the glory of all the Princes of the Land and Sea, as the Daulphin in lightnes and „swiftnes passeth all the Creatures, both of Land and Sea. We acknowledge you for „our Prince and soueraigne Lord vnder the King your Father, and the Queene your „Mother, and wee doe now offer vnto your Heighnes, our Liues, our Persons and our „Fortunes, for homage of our most humble & faithful subiection. These Goodly words „were accompanied with a Ritch present. It was a Cupberd of Plate richly wrought „and beautified with sondry figures of Daulphins, being valued at twelue thousand „Crownes. All that attended vpon the Prince had Presents of some value, or else Me-„dailles made for that purpose.

A Present

The Government of Bourgogne giuen phin*.

Renouation of the Pancarte.

The Sonnes present serued for the Mother. The King was the better pleased with this Deputation, for that it was in the first yeare of his Sonnes Infancie: and it is certaine that of al the proofs of Duty & Affection which the Subiects can yeeld vnto their Soueraigne, those are most commendable which are done without desseine.
 As Daulphiné doth acknowledge this Prince for their Soueraigne Lord vnder the King: soe Bourgogne and the Countries of Bresse, Baugy, Valromey, and Gez, (which are annexed vnto it) had him for their Gouverneur: But during his Infan-cie, and vntill hee were capable to vndergoe the functions of that Charge, the power of Lieutenantie was giuen to Roger of Bellegarde, first Gentleman of the Chamber, and Maister of the Kings Horse, who tooke his oath in the Kings hands. His Pattent was read in the Parliament of Dijon, the Cittie receiued him with all sorts of honours, and went to fetch him at the Carthusians where he made his abode, attending the preparation for his reception.

The Kings desires being seconded with so many prosperities, it pleased him of his owne bountie to take pittie of the Ruines and Calamities of his Subiects, in reuoking the Imposition of the Sublzypon the Lyure (or two shillings) which they called the Pancarte. Hee would not that this great releefe should surprize his peoples hearts, declaring his pleasure some monethes before it was put in practise, to the end that things being first expected before they were enioyed, might be the more acceptable. The King raised his coynes of Gold and Siluer, the Crowne to sixe shillings and sixe pence, the quarter of the Crowne to fixeteene Soultz, and the Franck to one and twentie and foure Deniers, that the coynes of siluer might bee valued after the rate of threescore and foure Soultz to the Crowne. And as that which is held good and profitable at one time, is not so at an other, the counting by Crownes (found in the yeare one thousand siue hundred seuentie and seuen, profitable and now verie preiudiciall) was forbidden, and that of the Lyure brought into practise in Contrasts, Obligations, and Acts of Iustice, as it was before, since King Philip the faire, Francis the first, and Hen-ric his Sonne.

There sprong vp a new ioy for all France. The Heauens which in former times did raine gold at Rhodes for the birth of Minerva, doth now power forth a great showre

A shower of Ioye for the birth of the Kings first lawefull daughter. The Queene was happely brought in bedde on the two and twenty day of Nouember in the morning, and thankes were giuen vnto God according to the vsuall Custome. The rest of this discourse is referred for accidents which are neuer found so perfect nor to hap-pie, but they haue still some contrariety, miseries are like vnto bad plants, which grow of themselves, the good must haue much paine & labour to make them growe: I here is great occasion to complaine in all places. The famine is so great in Lithuania and Borusia, as heretofore in Bohemia and Polonia, they did runne vnto the places of executions to take them downe that were executed, and to bury them in their lyuing bow-ells, although they were Censured as vnworthy to bee buried among the dead. The Riuer of Saonne was ouerflowed in that sort as the Townes that were seated vpon the bankes, were in great danger of this Inundation. The Bridge at Lions was to be shaken, as if it had not bene fortified by the waight that was layd vpon it, the two Townes had bene diuided by the riuer.

There was no worthy act in Hungary, but the remembrance thereof was fatall and shamefull for the Christians. They had the yeare before taken Alba Regalis by the valour and vertue of the Duke of Mercur, they are nowe shamefully expelled. As the French had the first glory at the taking of it, so nowe by dispaire and furie going to serue the Turke they had the pointe of the assault. All that were with in it were put to the sword. They with in the Castell sayd that the cowardise and small resistance of them within the Towne, was the cause of the losse of it, desiring to haue the like declaration from the Generall of the Turkes, to saue the Honour of their Capitulation. The Generall sent them word, that seeing they had bene resolu'd not to yeeld the place, vnlesse the Souldiars had forced them therevnto: It was reason they should remaine, so as hee caused the Souldiars to depart presently, and kept the Captaines prisoners.
 They found all the Artillery there which they had left, and twelue newe Cannons, foure hundred thousand weight of Powder, a great number of Bullets, two hundred Tunne of Meale, foure score of Biscuit, siue hundred of Salt, and tenne thousand Florins in ready Money to pay the Souldiars. (The Great Turke was so troubled for the losse of this Towne, and so much transported for the recovery thereof, as hee promised the Great Visier, his Aunt in Marriage, if hee could take it.) After the which he sought to take Pesla but in vaine. The Imperiall Army about the ende of September, attempted Buda and carryed it in recompence of the losse of Alba Regalis. It was thought at Rome, that the taking of the Towne, would cause the Castle to yeeld, and that there was no other place of strength but Belgrade, not onely in all Hungary, but euen vnto Constantinople. For this good newes which was but halfe true, the Pope went in Procession with all his Colledge of Cardinalls, from the Church of Minerva, vnto that of de l'Anima. The tege of Buda not succeeding according to his desire (the Christians hauing bene repulsed at a great Assault which they gaue about the ende of October, and the Duke of Neuers sore hurt with shot in the Shoulder) hee fell lame of the Gout, and other accidents for a whole moneth the which kept the Court of Rome in great suspence.

The season of the yeare forced our men to leaue Buda and to retire to Strigonia.
 They left a good garrison in Pesla, a Towne which is seperated from Buda by the Ri-uer of Danoue. They are so neere Neighbours as it is impossible they should continnue long enemies. The extreame cold in the beginning of the yeare did so freeze the Riuer of Danoue as the one passed ouer on drie foote to the other, and skimming some-times vpon the Ice. A Captaine of the garrison of Pesla, hauing intelligence that some of the chiefe of Buda were gone forth with many women to the Bathes which are neere vnto Buda, he past the Riuer with threescore shot, and surpris'd them in such sort, as hee died the water of the Bath with their blood, not sparing any but a little Childe borne to one of the chiefe of Buda. The women were so amazed, as they fled naked vnto the Towne, the feare of death was more powrefull in them then shame.

forth of Constantinople.

The Turkes had the aduantage this yeare both by Lande and Sea, they recoured what they had lost in Hungary, and disapointed the enterprises of the Sea Army of Spaine, the which were more grounded vpon the words and assurances of the King of Fez to deliuer Algier vnto them, then vpon consideration of their forces. Cigale went out of Constantinople with fifty sayle to obserue and followe them in their course. In the end D. Iohn of Cardona was no happier then the Prince Doria. It had bin a miracle if the Africans had intreated the Spaniards better then the Portugalls. One may say of the as was sayd of the Romaines. What may a man hope for of Rome which hath ruined Alba, from whence it is issued? What may one expect of the Kings of Fez, if for the desire of raigne the Sonne hath not spared the Father? Whilest that Muleasses was with the Emperour Charles the first to treat of his Protection, A. B mides his Sonne made him selfe master of the Realme.

Army.A Protestation of the mu-tinies.

The olde father returning with forces to enter into Thunis was taken in a passage where his Sonne had layed an Ambuscadoe, and with him two of his Children, which done, this barbarous wretch pulled out the eyes of them all three. Many thought that this Armie had had no desseigne, the Treasons of France being discovered: they had neede of it in Flanders, & many wondred to see the Spaniards seeke after new Conquests when as the affaires of the Lowe Countries were in so badde Estate.
Ostende was not yet readie to yeelde. Count Maurice had besieged Graue, to drawe the Arch-duke from Ostende if he might. There were in Graue fiftene hundred souldiars besides the Inhabitants. The Archduke commanded the Admirall of Aragon C to succour the besieged with all speed, who gathered together what troupes he could, and made many attempts vpon Count Maurices trenches, the besieged fallying forth of the Towne at the same times, but finding that all his enterprises were in vaine, hee made his retreat in the night, sending his baggage away before, and after that hee had stayed some dayes at Venlo, (the Inhabitants refusing to receiue the garrison which he would haue giuen them,) hee marched towards Vtrecht, hauing lost all hope to raysethe siege of Graue: considering that a great part of his troupes were slip away, especially the Italians, which yeelded themselues vnto Count Maurice, some continued and serued him, others tooke Passports from him and returned into their Countrie.
The siege of Graue continued still with all violence, the Walls and Rampers were D so battered, as they scarce durst shew themselues, and the besieged being bearen from their fortifications, seeing all things readie to giue a generall Assault, they made a composition to yeeld the nineteenth of September, vpon certaine conditions. The Count Maurice viued the souldiars with all humilitie, suffering them to carrie away their Armes, Enseignes, and all other Mouables.

The best troupes of the Admiralls Army were mutined, pretending that there was thre millions of Liners due vnto them, demanding their pay in a very vnseasona-ble time, seazing vpon the Castell of Hoochstraten, at such time as the Archduke thought to succour Graue. He held this as a revolt, infidelitie and intelligence with the Enemie, for which cause hee proclaymed them guiltie of high Treason, E permitting all men to Kill them without feare of punishment, promising tenne Crownes in recompence for euery souldiars head, a hundred for an Officers, two hundred for a Captains, & fise hundred for that of the Electo. The Mutinatedos published a declaration with iniurious tearmes and reproaches, saying that the Archdukes would pay them with Prescriptions and Banishments, a kind of pay and entertainment that doth neyther feede the Belly, nor couer the Backe: that in demanding that which was due vnto them they had done but as others had done in the like occasions, forced by necessity, being no Cameleons to liue of the aire. That to condemne the to die, which had no feare of death, & which had meanes not only to defend themselues, but also to offend, was absurd. That their heads being set to sayle at ten Crownes a peece, they did hope to defend them so well as their Highnesses should see but fewe F of them. Thus the Mutiners complayned, but in the ende they found that all complaints were vaine against their Superiors. The Arch-duke was engaged in a second warre

A Warre against his owne troupes, the which was no lesse trouble-some vnto him then the enemy, his discontent was much augmented by the defeat of the Galleies of Spaine that came into Flanders. 1602.

The Galleies of Spaine commended by Spinola.

This yeare their were eight Galleies rigged at Siuille, vnder the Comande of Frederic Spinola, there were 400. men in euery Galley, besides the slaues, and 800. men which they tooke in at Lisbonne. These Galleies went toward the Coast of England being sent by the King of Spaine to ioyne with others which the Arch-duke had, to hinder the trafficke of England, Holland and Zeland, and to keepe Ostend from ali reliefe.
Two of them, the Trinity and the Occasion were sonke by Sir Richard I.uson vpon the Coast of Portugalle, about the Cape of Sicambre, these Galleies were discovered the 3.
B of October by two Shippes of Warre of the States, who had them in chate. The same day Sir Robert Mansel discovered them beeing a thwarte Calis, giuing aduice vnto the States shippes which lay vpon the Coast of Flanders, by discharging of his Cannon. The States shippes finding them about the pointe of Douer, pursued them and fought with them, they flying as fast as they could to recouer some of their Portes in Flanders, but they were so ill intreated as foure of their Galleies were sonke, the other 4. which remayned were so hotly pursued as two of them were cast away vpon the Coast neere vnto Nieuport and an other neere Dunkerke, and the eight wherein Spinola was, ranne a shoare at Calais and was saued with great difficulty, where the Galley slaues being set at Liberty, euery one went where he pleased: and Spinola with C his Gentlemen and the rest that he could saue, went to the Arch-duke to Bruxelles.

The Admirall of Aragon, hauing sayled in the reliefe of Graue (and a part of his Armie beeing mutined for their pay, and seized vpon Hoochstraten) retired him selfe into Spaine, where hee was receiued with small grace and countenance, hauing serued his Master ill in the Lowe Countries.

This yeare all the Elements did contribute to the prosperity and blessings of the Peace, the Earth did let the King see a newe production of his Treasor. They discouered in many partes of the Realme mines of Gold, Siluer Copper and Lead. Mines of gold discovered.

In the Country of Lionois, neere vnto a village called Saint Martin the plaine, which depends of the Country of Saint Iohn of Lions, there was a Mine of Gold found by a D Countryman who laboring in his Vineyard found a flint stone intermixt with Gold, whereby they gathered an infallible assurance that this member was not without a bodie. De Vie Superintendant of the Iustice at Lions, had commandement from the King to set some to worke in it. The first production was admirable, and among many goodly peeeces, one was shewed vnto the King very riche, in the which the Gold did appeere and put forth like vnto the buds of a Vyne as fine as that of Carauana, so as it might bee sayd that these fise thousand yeares the Sonne had made nothing more perfect in the bowells of the Earth. For it was not Gold in Pepin nor in Poulder, as in the running streames of the newe found Land, nor mixt with sand as in Bohemia, but in Stoanes and in Rockes, all pure Gold or pure Siluer: for alwaies the one E goes with the other, perfect of it selfe without mixture of any other metrels.

The King immitating his Predecessors who had alwaies fauored the workes of Mines, which bring infinite commodities, made a generall Edict for the ordering of the worke and worke-men. Hee created a great Master and a Controuller generall ouer all the Mines of France, with priuiledges to drave in forraine worke-men which they could not want. Bellegarde was the first great Master of the Mines, who resigned it to Rafé Beaulieu Secretary of State. Bellingin first grome of the Kings Chamber, was Controuller generall.

the ordering of the Mines.

The newe allyance with the Suisses beeing concluded, they deputed fortie two among them, to whome they gaue power to sweare the obseruation thereof. They F came into France in September beeing honorable receiued in all places. The fourth of October they came to Charanton a League from Paris, where they were Royaly feasted at the Kings owne charge in Senamys house. After diner the Duke of 1602. Montbazou and the Lord of Montigny Gouvernor of Paris went out of the City with A a hundred or sixscore Gentlemen to meete them and to welcome them in the Kings name. At S. Antonies Gate, Bargelone Prouost of Marchants, with the Sherffes, Councillors of the City, Quarter-Maisters, chiefe Bourgeses, and the three Companies of the Archers of the City, received them, and conducted them to their lodging in S. Martins Streete. The next day they dined with the Chancellor, after Dinner he went to his Maiefty to the Louure, desiring them to haue a little patience, until the King sent for them. Soone after the Duke of Esquillon accompanied with fifty young Gentlemen of the best Houses that were then in Court, went to fetch them and to conduct them vnto the King: entring into the base court of the Louure, the Duke Montpensier with many Knights of the Holy Ghost, and Noblemen of make, B received them in the Kings name: at the Stayres foote going vp to the Hall, the Count of Soissons with many Gouvernors of Prouinces, and old Knights of the Order, receiued them, and so conducted them into his Maiesties Chamber, where they did their obeysance, the King taking euery one of them by the Hand. Then the Aduoyer of Bearne who was their speaker, said vnto him in his owne language, That the cause of their coming, was to sweare the renewing of the Alliance, and to assure his Maiefty of their faithfull seruice. Viger did interpret vnto the King, who after hee had answered them, and witnessed the content which he had of the Declaration they had made in the behalfe of their superiors, he told them, that they were welcome, from thence they went to kisse the Queenes hand, who was in her Chamber, with all the Princesses C and Ladies of the Court, presenting their seruice vnto her, and the good affection of their Superiors, for the which she thanked them.

Before the oath was taken, they intreated the King that it would please him to heare some particular charges they had from their Superiours. The Chancellor was appointed to heare what they demanded: the which the Aduoyer of Bearne deliuered vnto him in three Demands. The first was, that it would please his Maiefty to augment the summe of foure hundred Crownes, which was appointed to be distributed euery yeare among them, being not sufficient to pay their interests. The second was that the priueleges of thole of their Nation, which trafficked in France, might be confirmed. The third was, to giue them the declarations that were promised, as well vnto the five petty Cantons, for the continuance of their alliance with Milan and Sauoy, D without infringing that of his Maiefty, as to the Protestant Cantons, that they might not be forced to giue men to make Warre in France against them of the Religion. To the first his Maiefty made answer, that the ciuill and forraine Warres where-with his people had bene ruined, would not giue him meanes to do better yet, and that they must content themselves with that which had bene promised. The second and third were granted, and the declarations required by them, signed. Sunday the 12. of October was appointed for the swearing of the Alliance in our Ladies Church whether the Ambassadors were conducted by Monsieur de Vie. The King being come to the Church and set in State, the Princes of Condé and Conty went to fetch the 42. E Ambassadors in the Bishops Hall and conducted them to their places. All being set, the Archbishop of Vienne approached to his Maiefty, carrying a booke of the Euangelists in his hands, and at the same instant the Ambassadors drew neere also. Before them was Vagner Secretary of State at Soleure, betwixt M. de Sillery & de Vie, he carried betwixt his armes a Cushion of Crimson Veluet, garnished with Gold, on the which were two treaties of the Alliance, the one in French, the other in the Germane tongue, sealed with his Maiesties seale, and those of the Cantons and their Allies. After they had all done their duties and saluted his Maiefty, Monsieur de Sillery faide vnto the King: That these Treaties of Alliance were the same which his Predecessors had made with the Seigneuries of the Cantons: and that whatsoever was added, was for the honour and profit of his Maiesties seruice. The Aduoyer of Bearne who deliuered the speech, said; that the Seigneours of the Cantons their Superiors, had held it for a great honour, the desire the King had of their alliance, for the which thin- F king

Treaties of Alliance presented to the King.

The Aduoyer speech vnto the King.

A king themselves much bound, they had enioyned them to thanke his Maiefty, & to offer him on their behalfe their most humble seruice in all occasions that should be offered, and of all might be expected of true and faithfull allies & confederates, according to the Treaties of their alliance. That they were also sent by their Superiors for the performing of the oth, to the end they might faithfully obserue what was conteyned in the Treaty, and to beseech his Maiefty to do the like for his part, as it belongs to good & loyal Friends, Allies, & Confederats. That by his Maiesties comendement they presented themselves for the performance of the oth, praying God to poure out his blessings vpon so good an alliance, to the content of both the Estates: with praieres that it would please God to preferue the King & the Daulphin their new Allie, in all prosperity, long life & happy raigne. The King hearing him, stood vp with his hat on, & answered him with a great Maiefty. That he had desired to renew the treaty of Peace & alliance with the Seigneurs of the Cantons, for the great esteeme he made of the valour of their nation, who had alwaies bin parteners of the honor of his victories, and had made better trial thereof then any of his Predecessors, hauing bin happily assisted by them. That he did accept the offer of their succors, & did in like sort promise to assist them with all his forces and means against any one that should seeke to oppresse their liberty. The which he desired them to beleue, with assurance, that hee had neuer sayled in his promises: being ready to sweare the Treaty of alliance with them, and to obserue it inuolably. The Chancellor made a long speech vnto them to the same purpose, which done the Ambassadors presented themselves to sweare the oth, laying their hands by order of their Cantons vpon the holy Euangelists, to euery one of the which, the Chancellor sayd, You sweare & promise vpon the holy Euangelist, in the name of your Seigneurs & Superiors, well and faithfully to obserue, the Treaty of alliance made betwixt his Maiefty and your Superiors, without any contradiction or breach directly or indirectly. The order which the Ambassadors held in the oth was, first, The Cantons of Berne, Lucerne, Zurich, Schwits, Vendervald, Zug, Glais, Basle, Fribourg, Soleure, Schaffuse and Appenzel. Allies, the Abbot of S. Gall, and the Towne of S. Gull. Grisons, the Canton of Grise, the Cades, the Canton of Droitsuaes, Walais, Mulkuff, Rotweil and Brenne. After all the Ambassadors had taken the oth, the King likewise sayd. That hee did sweare and promise to obserue the treaty as it had bin agreed. Which done they dined in the Bishops pallace. The Prince of Condé sat at the bords ende, the Princes of Conty, Soissons and Montpensier, the Constable, the Dukes of Neuers and Esquillon, the Counte of Auvergne and Sommeiue, with many others were on the right hand, and the forty two Ambassadors with some French gentlemen on the left. About the end of diner, his Maiefty (who had dined apart) came to see them, commanding euery one to keepe his place, then he called for wine, and dranke to all his Friends and Allies, and so went presently to the Louure: towards the euening bonfires were made and twenty peeces of Cannon shot of in signe of ioy. During there aboad at Paris they were feasted by the Prouost of Marchants the Count of Soissons, the Constable, & the Duchesse of Longueuill, & the Friday after the ceremony of the oth, they toke their leaue of the King, who gaue to euery one a chaine of Gold, and what was appointed for their voyage, stay and returne, and so they returned into their Country. Of all religious Orders that haue bin instituted for the defence of the Christian faith, and to oppose against Mahomets, thole of the Hospitall of S. Iohn of Ierusalem are the first, and which alone by the diuine providence of God haue maintayned themselves in their beauty, & profession: the Knights and religious of that order exposing themselves continually to infinit dangers, the Island of Malta which is now their place of residence, seruing for a strong Bul-warke against the incursions of Turkes and Barbarians, the Common enemies of Christendom. The enterprise vpon the Towne of Affricke, was plotted & managed by the aduice of Adolfe of Wignacourt great Master of Malta, who being loth to suffer the season of the Sommer to passe away without some worthy exploit, made a dessein vpon this place of Mahomet being 350. miles distant from Malta, being strong & well peopled, in former times besieged by the King of Thunes with twelue thousand men, and sence attempted by the Prince Doria with forty Gallies but could not take it. 1602. The great Master intending to execute this desseigne in the moneth of May, was A diverted, the King of Spain having required them to assist him with five Gallies for the transporting of his footemen from Naples to Genoa, from whence they returned not until the end of July, being come to Malta, they prepared all things necessary for this execution with such speede, as the fourth of August following they set sayle with some Fregates, for the easier landing of their men. And bending their course towards the Island of Lampedouze (being distant from that of Malta about 120. miles) they came thither the first daie in the night: one of the Fregates being set in gard, discouered two Turkish Boistes, the which the Gallies followed and tooke in lesse then three houres with fifty and eight Turkes in them. The sayd Gallies following their Course, the winde grew B heigh, and being to enter into the gulfes of Mahomet which was threescore miles long (being so called by reason of the sayd Towne) they kept aloofe attending the Calme, because they would not bee discouered, so as they arrived there the thirteenth of the sayd month, being about an houre after the breake of day, which was contrary to their intents, desiring to come in the night for the better landing of their men, and at the pointe of day to begin the execution of their enterprize. The Knights notwithstanding fainted not, but hoping of a happy successe, they landed neere vnto the Towne, notwithstanding the difficulty of the place, where there was scarce any footing, and the Artillery which plaied continually vpon them, yet they put themselves into good Order, being (besides those that were left for the gard of the Gallies) seauen hundred men, among the which there were two hundred and forty Knights, being all led by the C Commander Mathan Auvergnac.

This small troupe marching couragiously and in good Order towards the Towne: the Knights of Beau-regard and Canremy aduanced, hauing severall charges to plant Petards to two gates, whereof the one was towards the Sea and the other to the Land, eyther of them being followed by twenty Knights and Souldiars. There did two squadrons aduance to support them, eyther of them consisting of fifteene Knights and five and twenty Souldiars, the one of them was commanded by the Seigneur of Harlem Sonne to the Lord of Saint Luc deceased, great Master of the Artillery of France. In the meane time the Knights who had the charge to plant the Ladders were diligent, so as both the one and the other contemning the infinite number of shot which came D from the Towne, in the which there were 800. fighting men to defend the walles, in a short time the gates were forced and layed open with the Petards. Then came they to handie blowes with the enemies, as they did in like sort that were appointed, for the Scaladoc who recovered the Walles notwithstanding any resistance the Turkes could make: but the Christians increasing both in number and courage, forced them to abandon the Courtine and to retire into the streetes and houses; then the bodie of the Christians aduanced, which entring slewe many Turkes, who seeing themselves still forced, got vp to the toppe of their houses, from whence they did much annoy the Christians with Arrowes, Darts and Stones, desiring rather to be flaine then to yeeld themselves Captiues: so as after foure houres fight, the Christians E were Masters of all the Towne. During this time, some Turkes and Moores had fortified themselves in the Sangiacs house, whether the Seigneur of Harlem came with his troupe, hee entring the first into the house, the which by his and their valour was soone forced: but neglecting to put on a Cuirasse, hee was unhappely thrust through the bodie with a Lance, and died six houres after, being much lamented of the Christians. His body was buried at Malta with a funerall Pompe worthy of his name & reputation. The Christians hauing no knowledge of a false Port, there were about 2000. persons that escaped, so as there remained but 396. prisoners. The Towne was sacked, and not being able to keepe it for many wants, especially of victuels, they fired it, and made an honorable retreat to their Gallies, in the vewe of a great number of F horse and foote that were come to succor the Towne, returning to Malta the sixteenth of August.

The great Master went presently with all his Knights to the chiefe Church, praising and

A and thanking God for so notable an assistance in so dangerous an enterprize, hauing lost but foure Knights, and five and twenty souldiars: and about fourecore and ten hurt; and of the Mahometans there were about three hundred flaine vpon the place. But let vs returne into France, and obserue the tragicall History of two famous Murthers, which happened this yeare, by reason of Adultery: the one in Burgundy, the other at Paris. The first of a Gentlewoman, which caused her Husband to bee flaine, and his Nephew, by her Ruffians: and the last of a Gentleman which slew his Wife and her Adulterer, finding them in bed together. Murthers happened this yeare for Adultery.

In the Iurisdiction of the Towne of Langres (in a Village called Apres) Claude Berenger Lord of Pont, and Guillemette of Metz his Wife made their residence, hauing also a Nephewe of the sayd Berengers with them named also de Pont. This Woman being suborned by a Chanons Bastard of Langres, named Chauvitey, Nicholas Tourne and Iohn Pernet called the youth, to satisfie their fleshy lust without suspition, and at more liberty, they resolved with her and a Maide of hers to make away her Husband and his Nephewe. This plot being layd, they found an easie meanes for the execution. These three Adulterers seeing the Gentleman gone to Langres, got a hunting with his Nephewe, whom they slewe in the thicke of a Woode, and threwe him into a deepe hollowe place betwixt two high rockes, out of the which he could neuer be drawne. These Murtherers seeing themselves ridde of this poore young man, reported vnto the Gentlewoman what they had done, concluding with her to cut her Husbands throat at his returne from Langres, the which they put in practice the same night that hee returned, for this poore Gentleman hauing receiued a kisse (of this daughter of Indas) being very weary, went to bed and slept, the which shee knew, and presently brought these Murtherers into his chamber, who comming easily to this poore yong mans bed, being a sleepe, they cut his throte, and burye him abroad among the Rockes. After this Murther they giue it out, that the Lord of Pont was flaine in his voyage to Langres. His Wife puts on a Mourning weede, and makes a counterfeite shewe of heauinesse: but God suffers not such offences to be vnreuealed, a poore man found out the hole where they had buried him, and gaue notice thereof vnto the Iustice, who went to the place, and caused the Gentlewoman D to be brought thither, who at the first seemed not to know him, but seeing that he was knowne by euery one, and vanquished by apparent signes, which they shewed her, in the end shee knewe him. But the Officers did not proceede against her with that dexterity that Lugoly did to the wife of Claude Anthoine a Marchant of Vines at Paris, who had also caused her Husband Anthoine to bee flaine comming from a house of his, by Souldiars whom one named Iumeau (her Adulterer) had suborned, for the Wife of the saide Anthony was hanged, and Iumeau broken aliue at the place Maubert: but this Gentlewoman du Pont, seeing the Iustice to proceede against her by Informations, and that they intent to apprehend her, she made an escape with all her Complices and her Seruant, and could neuer after be taken; yet through E their contempt their processe was made, and all of them were hanged in Picture. The other accident happened at Paris, of a Gentleman which slew his Wife and her Adulterer lying together, in this manner. This Gentleman called Seigneur Scipio, being aduertised that his Wife (a fayre young Gentlewoman) did abandon her selfe to lust, and defiled his bed with a yong man: he admonished his Wife, and said vnto her; That he did willingly pardon what was past, but if she returned any more to her sinne, he would kill her with her Ruffian, if he found them together. The Gentlewoman skornes this aduice; and to an other giuen her by a Wife and Vertuous Gentlewoman; That if shee did not carry her selfe more discreetly, without doubt her Husband would do her a shrewde turne. She answered her, That her Husband was too very a F Foole to attempt it.

Seigneur Scipio aduertised of the Impudency & lewd behauiour of his Wife, takes his horse, & makes a show to go into the Country: his wife goes to the Sermon at S. Germain l'Auxerrois, Scipio returnes, and shuts himselfe into his Closet vnknowne of

The Sermon being done, she returned presently to her house, and advertised her Adulterer of her Husbands absence, who sayled not to come at the nation she gaue him, and then they went into the Husbands bed: who comming off his Closset, found them naked together, and slue them, the Adulterer had wounds, and the Woman seuen and twenty: and to their detestable sinne was added by the view of their dead bodies, the which were brought before the Iustice, being a lamentable thing, and pittifull to behold. The Husband did easily obtaine his pardon, the which proceeds from the Kings bounty. It is a iust griefe the which may be to transport a Husband, finding his Wife with an other, as these poore unfortunate wretches were. The King about this time pardoned all those, that had bene of the Duke of Birons Conspiracy, so as they came & declared themselves within two moneths, and caused their Pardons to be confirmed. The Towne of Emden as we haue said, was in quarrell with the Earle of East-Friseland, the which increased in such sort, that the Inhabitants seeing the Earle to hinder their Nauigation, hauing built vp Forts in diuers places, and by this meanes to force them to Obedience: being thus prouoked they demand succors from the States of the Vnited Provinces, they which they easily obtaine. Entering into the Earles Iurisdiction with these succors, they bring all vnder their command, and presse the Earle in such sort, as he is forced to go and purge himselfe of that which was imputed vnto him before the States at the Hage, & to request them to be a meanes to end their Controuersies, the which they did at his request, making by this meanes a Peace would be soone made betwixt them. Afterward there was a Complaint made to the Electors of the Empire, (for that Emden is of the inferior Circle) vnto whom the States sent to lay open their reasons of the assistance which they had lent to the Inhabitants of Emden. That it was well knowne the Earle was greatly fauored by the Spaniard, and that he pretended to deliuer the Towne of Emden to the Archduke, to be Maister of the Sea by that meanes, and to annoy the Estates, with their Allies and Confederates. That therefore they held it a part of their duties, to mediate a good accord betwixt them, the which they had propounded at Delfe, where with the Earle in the beginning was well pleased. But since he brake off, and hath built Forts vpon the River of Amise, the which was neuer tollerated in any of his Predecessors. That they might iustly suspect him, for that one of his brethren followed the Archduke, who had of late sent him into Spaine. That the Archduke pretended to be Earle of East-Friseland, as it appeares by the Peace of Vernins, where he giues himselfe the Title.

Moreouer they were duly aduertised of the said Archdukes praistises against them who sought all meanes to surprize them, and that it had bene resolved on at Bruxelles. They therefore required the sayde Electors to take in good part what they had done, hauing no intent to preiudice the rights of the Empire, but to assure their Provinces by all meanes, and in like sort to helpe their Neighbours and Friends, to maintaine their Liberties and Freedomes. Their excuses were held by some of the Deputies for variable, and by others, that they were not to bee regarded, notwithstanding, haueing consulted vpon all the points, and considered of the reasons on either side, the Treaty of Peace was continued betwixt the Earle and the Inhabitants of Emden. The Discourse of the enterprises and intelligences which the Duke of Sauoy and his Father haue had, to surprize the City of Geneua, with their pretensions, and their defence on the contrary side to maintaine their Liberties, would make a good volume. They relied vpon the publike assurance of the Treaties of Vernins, Paris and Lions, in the which they held themselves to be comprehended, and so assured from all the defeignes of their neighbours. The Duke of Sauoy did not hold himselfe tyed by the Peace, not to seeke the meanes to become Maister thereof, and to raigne there as his Predecessors had done, and that there was no danger to breake his Faith with People of a contrary Religion. This City doth so much import his Estates, as it deserues, if not to breake the Peace, at the least to straine and wreste it. It is situated at the end of Lake Leman, which serues for a Ditch on the North part: The River of Rhofne passeth

Excuses made by the States of the Vnited Provinces.

The Duke of Sauoy enterprised vpon Geneua.

The situation of Geneua.

A passeth by the Towne on the West side, and vpon the East and South is the Countrey of Sauoy, the Great and Rich Playnes of the Baylewikes of Thonon and Ternier, and the Countreies of Chablais and Faucigny. The Duke had great pretensions to it, as the Dukes Soueraigne of the Countrey of Geneua, and Vicar perpetuall of the Empire. Hee maintained, that if the Bishop of Geneua had any absolute authority, it was without preiudice to the Soueraigntie, the which hath alwayes remained to his Predecessors, as Earles of Morienne or Dukes of Sauoy.

The City of Geneua (who to maintaine her liberty findes all propositions of seruitude troublesome and strange, hath alwayes detested the Sauoyards command) sayes; That the Bishops of Geneua haue bene alwayes soueraigne Princes of their City, and that the Earles of Sauoy and Geneua, haue often done homage to the Bishops of Geneua, for the Barronyes of Ternier, Remilly, Montfaucon, and for the County of Geneua. That the Duke of Sauoy can pretend no right, as Vicar perpetuall of the Empire, being granted by surpris, and reuoked after examination of the cause by the same Emperor, who vpon complaint made vnto him by a Bishop of Geneua, called Ardutius, declared that hee had bene surpris'd in that behalfe, and disannul'd all that hee had giuen to the Earle of Sauoy his Cousin, forbidding him to contradict this reuocation, vpon paine of his indignation, and a thousand Markes of pure Golde. The parties differing vpon the mayne point, the question could not be decided without prooffe. The Duke would haue no other production, but his Title of Duke and Soueraigne of Geneua, to maintaine the which hee beleegged the Towne, and brought it to extremity, as hath bene shewed elsewhere. It is true, that without the Kings protection this city could not long resist the forces of the Duke of Sauoy. Being abandoned by the King, there is no defence for them, but will proue weake, against so mighty a Neighbour, who shall bee alwayes assisted by the greatest Forces of Italy and Spaine. And if they bee succoured by them of Bearn with whom they haue an equall alliance, they shall ruine the hazard of Common weales, which in the ende haue bene recompensed with a forced subiection. The Suisses propound not bare words in their Amities, they ground them vpon equality of profit. The humor of this City is to bee free, there is not any Cittizen but speakes freely to any Prince howe great soeuer, as Demosthenes sayde, when they talked of the milde and easie commande of Anipater. Wee will haue no Maister howe gentle soeuer. The Inhabitants of this City haue an hereditary hatred against the Duke, the which is so rooted in them, as if hee did presse them by force to the extremities of a Seege, they would resolue with them of Xanthe to mingle their Ashes with the smoake of their Houses. The Duke hauing attempted what he could by Force, resolues to surprize them nowe by Policy.

Hee made an enterprize as full of proofes of his Courage, Iudgement and good Condukt, as of his Misfortune. It had bene long in hand, and yet nothing was discovered, yet was it well knowne, that hee had caused Ladders to bee made. That from all parts hee drew vnto him Men of Resolution; that hee had good numbers at Chambery well payd, and well intertained, attending the full ripenesse of this desleigne, and yet they knew not howe hee would employ them, preparing onely their Hearts and Armes for the execution of their Princes Commandments, referring the Condukt thereof to his wisdom. Yet could they not beleuee that this desleigne was against them of Geneua, for that hee Treated with them of the Liberty of Trafficke, hauing some fewe dayes before sent President Rachette to let them vnderstand that it was expedient to Treat of some manner howe to liue for the ease of the people. They were so well pleased with this motion and his assurances, that although Citties of this condition doe not easily beleuee them that make Warre against them, yet they were lulled a sleepe therewith, and neglected their preservation, thinking that there was nothing of more power to defend them,

The Dukes pretensions.

The defence of the Geneuois.

The Vicar obtained by the Earle of Sauoy in the year 1306. & reuoked in the year 1383.

1602. then the Treaties of Peace betwixt France, Spaine and Sauoy. In like sort the Dukes A Subjects went so freely to Geneua, as the Eue before this execution, certaine Gentlemen who knew something of this desseigne, being come into the City to buye Horses sayde. That they would come the next day to conclude the bargain: and others had viued the like speeches for other Marchandize, beleeuing that the victory was assured: but Heauen which laughs at the presumptions of these Imaginations, had resolved to humble them.

The Gouverneur of Lions had speedye intelligence, that the Duke of Sauoy was come on this side the Alpes, and that he had brought scaling Ladders: he aduertised the King thereof, and made provision for the City of Lions. D'Albigny Lieutenant Generall for the Duke on this side the Alpes, had drawne them downe, and lodged B them in Townes neere to Geneua, The Rendezuous was at Chambery, the time of the execution was referred to the Generall. The Troupes began to march about six of the clocke: Brignolles Gouverneur of Bonnes had bin a chiefe actor in this desseigne, holding it so certaine, as he said. He would die if he did not live in Geneua. D'Albigny had set gardes vpon all the waies to stay all passengers, that no report might go before them, and that the Duke of Sauoyes marching might be vnknowne, to who they represented the execution to be so easie & certaine, as he would needs be there himselfe in perso-C
to reape the fruite, and the triumph which his Grand-father had begon. He past the Alpes but with fife in his company, & came the same day neere vnto Tremblieres, a village but a league distant fro Geneua. They which should execute the enterprize and attempre first, went along the river of Albe, that the noyse of the water might keepe the Sentinells from hearing them as they marched. Two things happened that were Bad signes. predictions of bad successe. There appeared vnaccustomed fires in the ayre. A Hare crossed them many times in their way, and gaue them a false Alarum. Manie things were seene that night that troubled their imagination, causing them to take Groues for squadrons of Men, & Thistles for Lances, as it happened once before Paris. About eleuen of the clocke at night, they discouered certaine stakes, on the which the Serge-makers of Geneua did drye their Serge. Those that were in the foremost ranks would haue charged them, thinking it was some Ambuscado. From thence they side of Corratiere, without beeing discouered by the Sentinells, although the Dukes in the Ditch made what noyse they could to awake them of Geneua, as the Geefe had done at Rome against the Gaules. They passed the Ditch vpon Hurdells, and planted three Ladders against the Walles, they were of a strange Inuention, beeing portabie vpon Moyles, and to bee made as long and as short as they pleased, and yet they were as stronge as if they had beene but of one peece.

If they had beene as fortunate, as they were well furnished of all things necessary, they had executed their desseigne happely. They had made provision of Hatchets, Hamers and Pincers, to cut in fonder Chaines of Iron, breake open Lockes and to pull out great Nails and barres of Gates. They had many Petards, and iewe that could vie them. Fortune which is powerfull in such enterprises fayled them, after that shee had brought them into the midst of the Towne, and made them Masters of the streetes aboue two houres. There were almost two hundred men mounted by one of these Ladders. Brignolet was the first, carrying himselfe more valiantly then wisely. Having reco-uered the Wall, he surprisid the Souldiar that stood Sentinell, he got the Word from him and slewe him, and cast him into the Ditch, staying in his place for him that went the Round, that he might do as much to him, the which hee effected, com-ming to giue him the word in his care. The Boy which carried the Lanthorne fled, and aduertised the Corps de Garde what had happened to his Maister, wherewith notwithstanding they were not greatly mouued.

The first discovery of the surprize.

This

A This was betwixt one and two of the clocke, attending the houre of foure, for then they had propounded to begin the execution, meaning to giue more time to them that were to second them, and to haue the day draw neere, for that in all executions of warre which are done in the night, there is confusion. The Assaylants had a good houres respight to mount, and as much time more before they incountred any that made resistance. It D'Albigny had bene within to vse the benefit of the time, and to dispose more wisely of things, then Senas, Brignolet, or Attignac had done, they might bouldly haue said the Towne had bin wonne. Halfe an houre after two of the clock, a sentynell in the Tower of the minte, hauing heard some rustling in the ditch, short off his peece to giue the Alarum, and forced Brignolet to discouer himselfe, charging

B all that were at the Corps de gard of the new gate, to plant the Petard there, and to make an entrie for the bodie of the armie which was in Plainpallais. They forced the Corps de gard being but fife and twentie men: but against the Maximes of warre, which commands them to kill all, they let one escape, who ran vp and let downe the Portcullis. to make their Petard vnprofitable. The Towne was full of cries and fearefull exclamations, wherof the Sauoyards should haue made their profit, & increased their courage, as it did daunt the Inhabitants, who knew not which way to runne, some cri-ing to one gate, others running to another. But the Assaylants lost themselues in the appearance of so happie a successe. Those without should haue giuen an Alarum at some gate, to diuide the forces of the Towne. Those that were within, made no vse

C of their Hatchets, Hammers, and Pincers: they did forget to fire some houses, and they were surprisid with a dulnes of spirit, thinking more of booty and spoyle, then to make perfect their Conquest. In the meantime, the Confull cries as they did sometimes at Rome. Hee that loues mee, let him follow mee. Some Countymen of the neighbour villages which kept gard in the Towne-house by turnes, being led by some Captaines and Townesmen, presented themselues to the new gate, they were valiantly repulsd, and yet the first shot they made, slue their Petardiar, who was bursic about his Petard. This first charge had not dilodged them, if the whole strength of the Inhabitants had not come, and charged them so furiously, as they began to giue way, shewing neither conduct nor courage. Necessitie which breeds assurance, euen vnto them that are borne without courage, made the Townsmen so resolute in this defence, as the Sauoyards did presently turne their backs. The nimblest were forced to returne to their ladders, which now could no longer serue them, for a Cannon planted vpon the Bulwarke de l'Oye against the ditch, had broken them in such sort, as they left foure and fiftie dead vpon the place, along the Curtyne of Corratiere, and thirtene that were taken aliue. If the Townsmen had had souldiars inough to haue made a sallie in this Confusion, those that were at Plainpallais had not returned in soe good order. There were thirtene taken aliue, vpon promise that was giuen them that they should bee prisoners of warre, for else they would haue preferred an honorable death, before any promise that was made them, to take them aliue, and to disarm

them.

Attignac was among them, who fought couragiously, and gaue the order of Saint Maurice (which he wore) to his seruant, willing him to saue himselfe, being re-solued to die with his sword in his hand. It had beene better for him to haue bin slaine at the Combate of D. Philippin, then to be reterued for so ignominious a death.

The Seigneurie would not intreat them as prisoners taken in the warre, but like theeues that had entred the Towne by the wall, against the Law of Nations, and the publike faith. They sayd that the Duke was too noble a Prince to aduow so wicked and treacherous an Act. There were many opinions vpon the Iudgement of their death.
The most modest concluded to haue them put to ranfome, others to keepe them prisoners, that they might serue for exchange if occasion required, through the continu-ter they had beene strangled. The threescore and seuentene Heads, as well of those that had beene hanged, as of the others that had beene slaine, were planted vpon the Galloes, and their bodies throwne into the Riuer of Rhose. On the Tewiday after they made a generall Fast for their deliuey. They presently sent to al their neighbours for Succors. They published in all places, the wonders of this deliuey. They write vnto the Gouvernor of Lions in this manner. My Lord, you haue vnderstood heretofore, by many of our Letters, how his Highnesse of Sauoy, notwithstanding that he knew, and had confessed, that we were comprehended in the Peace made in I-nuary 1600. betwixt his royall Maiesty of France and him: yet he hath oppressed vs in B sondry sorts, not onely by the detayning of our Reuenues; forbidding of trafficke and other Violences and Exortions, yeelding nothing to the many and iust admonitions of his Maiesty, but also hath attempted often to inuade and surprise vs in this time of Peace. So it is, that to glut his pernicious desleigne, the Lord of Albigny on Saterdag last the eleuenth of this month, about Mid-night, had brought before our Towne, on the side of Plainpalais, about two thousand choise men, Horse and Foote, and had cast about two hundred into our Ditch, nere vnto the old Gate of Corratiere, and hauing planted Ladders one within an other, hee had caused them to mount about three of the clocke on the Sunday morning the twelfth of the month, encouraging C them, being himselfe in the Ditch, so as being entred into the Towne, some went to the Newe-gate to plant the Petard, and to drawe in the body of theyr Troupes, which made a stand in the Meadow of Plainpalais, others would haue seized vpon the Minte-gate, and so haue entred into the midst of our Towne. But it pleased our good God to looke vpon vs with a fauourable eye, and to giue courage to our Men, so as they haue repulst them so valiantly, as they haue slaine the best part of them vpon the place, and some others haue beene taken, and since hanged by our commandment. The rest haue cast themselves head-long downe the Valles, so as wee heare that manye of them are dead or grievously hurt. But it is likely that the Lord of Albigny will continue his hatred against vs; hauing also intelligence, that his Highnesse is not farre from vs. Wee therefore most humblye pray and D intreat you withall our affections, that it woud please you duely to consider the preiudice which the taking of our Towne would bring vnto his Maiesties seruice, and to continue your fauour towards vs, and assist vs, with your Wife and Graue aduice. &c.

Many Iudged of the ende of this enterprife by the beginning, and were more dilligent to write then they had beene to execute it well. The King had intelligence, that the Duke was Maister of the Towne, and the manner of the execution was represented with so great ease and happines, as there was lesse reason to doubt it then to beleue it. The truth was not knowne but by Letters from the Gouvernor of Lions, the which came before any discourse that was published by the Towne that was deliue- E red. The Duke repast the Mountaines in post, his Troupes remained a league from Genewa in three places, at Toumon, Essigny and Termier. He commanded his Ambalsador to giue the Senate of Berne to vnderstand, that he had not made this enterprife to trouble the quiet of the Cantons, but to preuent L'Escliquieres from beeing Maister thereof, who intended to deliuer it vp afterwards vnto the King, who had beene too mighty a Neighbour, and would haue giuen them alltogether occasion to feare him.
 The issue of this Enterprife did shewe, that God will not haue Treaties violated, for of the neereft Prouinces, to ayde them all they could. The Cantons of Bearne and Fribourg allied to Genewa, being aduertised of this attempt, sent twelve hundred Suisses, and the King who had an interest that it should not fall vnder the command of any other Prince or Common-weale, sent also fixe hundred French. All prepares to Warre, the Genewois made some courses into the Duke of Sauoyes Countrye, and surprised S. Geny of Aouft, they imagined vpon a little good successe, to extend theyr limits vnto Mont Cenis. The King commanded De Vie his Ambassador in Suis-serland, (who returned then to his charge) to passe by them, to assure them, that hee was not of their humors, which frame not their affections, nor binde not the duties B of friendship but vpon good euent, louing Friendes no longer, then they draw profit from them. That he would neuer sayle them for their defence and protection desiring to know of them, what meanes they might haue to make an offensive War, to the end, the succours he should lend them, might bee profitably employed. They receiued De Vie with a publike applause, sending forth the French Horse and Foote, to meete him: but as hee was deceiued in this vnexpected Ceremony; so were many others which thought that hee came to encourage them to Warre. They heard his Propositions in a priuate Conference, exhorting them rather to a long and durable Peace, then to a short Warre. They intreated him to propound the like in their generall Assembly, which no man else durst doe, euery one holding it a C Crime, and a signe of Basenesse, not to preferre the Councells of Warre, before any Accord, and not to enter in Hostile manner into the Dukes Countrey. Some which had neuer seene War, but in the Idea, conceiued Victories in their imaginations, building vpon the Snowe of Mont Cenis. That it would not continue aboue fixe months; that the Warre would bee no lesse profitable for the good of their Common weale, nor lesse happy, then it had beene to their Neighbours, in the time of Duke Charles: and that all that had any interest in their preseruacion would assist them. That all those great Spirits which delighted in the exercise of Warre, would come and offer them their Armes and Liues.

De Vie through the trueth and excellency of his discourse, gaue them to vn-derstand; That Peace was so necessary for them, and Warre so preiudiciall, as they had great reason to imbrace the one, and to flye the other. That although the causes of Warre, be alwayes goodly, and the meanes made casie, yet the effects were no lesse terrible, the successe being not alwayes answerable to their hopes.
 That a forraine Warre was profitable, and to be vndertaken when as Ciuill Wars could not be otherwise auoyded: but a well seled Estate, which hath alwayes liued happily by Peace, should not seeke these stormes, nor take delight to bee at Warre with her Neighbors. Thus he perswaded them to imbrace Peace, but a Peace with these three qualities, Assured, Profitable, and Honourable. A Peace confirmed by an equall Commerce of all Commodities, and which should roote out all occasions of Warre. They entred into some Truce with the Duke, but hauing required assurances for the obseruation thereof, it beeing not honorable, they proceeded no farther, and the Duke gaue them to vnderstand that it was indifferent to him, whether they were his friends or enemies. The King who is a Prince full of Iustice and Integrity, foreseeing that this Warre would not be ended by them that did begin it, Desired to maintaine the Peace which was so necessary for all Christendome, for the which hee had layd aside Armes, when as he might hope for most fruite for the increase of his Estates His Ambassador therefore in Suisserland perswaded the Cantons of Glaris, Basle, Soleurre, Schaffhouse and Appenzel, as least suspected and interested, to be the mediators of this Accord. There was some difficulty, but the Seigneury wearied with a Warre, the profit whereof could not repaire the ruines which the want of Peace should cause, and hauing tryed that all the profit they could hope for, depended on their neighbors succors. That hope which is not maintayned but by forraine supports, is alwayes ruinous: That they had no meanes to reuenge the wrong that was done vnto them:

The Conference of the Treary was at Rouilly with D' Albigny, and the Conclusion at Saint Julien, berwixt the deputies of either part. If the issue hath bene happy and profitable to both parties, they are bound to none but the grace of God and to the Kings wisdome, who desiring to entertaine the publike quiet hath made a peacefull vnion of those willes that were so much diuided, for at his Instance the Swisses had laied a side more Mulkets and Pikes which they had provided, then had bene scene in Sauoy B in ten yeares before, and they of Genoua did moderate their demands, nor so much for any respect of their enemy, as to please the King, yet the malicious gaue it out that the King had incensed them to Warre by his Ambassadors. The Consulate of Lions had obtrayned of the King (at the Queenes intreaty, and in consideration of the Honor done her at her entry) a Priuledge, by the which none might come to be Sheriffes, that were not Towne-borne Children, it was the same prerogative which Pescenius Niger had giuen vnto the Romaines, forbidding any person to bee admitted to publicke charges that was not borne and bred a Romaine. Euery Priuledge which causeth an inequality among Cittizens (lyuing vnder the same Lawes) is the Apple of discord and cause of diuision, like vnto that of the Bianchi and Neri at Florence. This newe distinction of persons must needs cause dangerous innouations in a Cittie, where the inner part is mote to be feared then the outward. Those which pretended to be from their beginning, by birth and affection of the Country of Lions, seeing themselves perpetually excluded from the most honorable charges within the City, had recourse vnto the King, laying before him the inequality of this Priuledge, the disgrace which they receiued, and the ruine which should fall vpon the Cittie, when the Inhabitants should abandon the place of their abode, and that they might not remaine in a place where without offence or any iust cause, they were for euer depriv'd of that little Honor they might hope for, after they had serued the Publike in many burthenfome charges. Those which were originally borne at Lions sayd, that the Inhabitants of the Coun- D ty conuincing thether, labored more for their own profit, then for the good of the publike, & did not much affect the publike good, if they did not hope for their owne private commodities, hauing no hands but for themselves. That it was neither profitable nor commendable to impart the chiefe Honours, and to commit the government of the City to newe men, for many reasons which haue bene set downe by the wise, but especially least they confound the ancient Order & Gouernment with strange Customes and Manners. The King considering that a smal matter doth trouble a multitude (as the encounter of a ditch doth disorder the ranks of an Army when it marcheth) hee gaue them to vnderstand that he desired they should agree together, sending them to la Guiche the Governor of Lions to reconcile these willes diuided only vpon this subiect, but vnited in all other points that concerned the obedience and seruice of his Maiesty. This diuision began to decreafe when as they vnderstoode that his Maiesties pleasure was to content both parties, to reduce things to the ancient order wherein they had liued happily, and not to suffer the good correspondency which had bin betwixt the Inhabitants of one City, to be lost by the inequality of this Priuledge, the which by fruitlesse Inno- uations did alter that which the Ancients had allowed & maintayned. The King there- fore commanded that the reasons of either part should be carefully examined & considered of in his Councell. The President Ianin was reporter of this Controuersie. The Councell hauing vnderstood the Kings intention, and considered of the Governor of Lions aduice, thought, that as they might not change the Ancient Customes in the which they had liued well, so it was iust and reasonable to gratefie the Originall families of the City, for that they had suffred most in these last troubles, and had opposed themselves most resolutely against the faction. They therefore thought it

At good that there should remaine a distinction with some marke or prerogative of 1603.

honor, reseruing the charge of Prouost of Marchants for such as were Cittizens borne, and that those of the Countrey which had continued there for tenne yeares Heads of families, should bee capable of the Consulship, to enter indifferently with them that were borne there. By this Declaration both the one and the other had part of their demands. The King sending them backe, recommended vnto them Obedience, & Respect to their Gouvernor, and Concord and Vnitie among themselves. And for that in the last Consular Elections there had bene something done indiscreetly, the Chancellor vsed some words vpon that subiect, both Graue, iust, and worthy the greatnes of his Charge. It is my opinion (sayd hee) that as the King hath an interest

B that none should be choien for Maiestrates of a Towne, but those, of whose Loyaltie his Maiesty is well assured, so the more the libertie of election is left vnto them, the more obedience should his Maiesty, the Gouvernors and Lieutenants Generall of Provinces finde in the Inhabitants, in that which it should please him to command them: The King desiring to increase the comodities of the Realme, and to enrich his Subiects, hauing tryed in his royal houses of Fontainebleau, Madril, and the gardens of the Tuelleries, that silke wormes might be bred and brought vp as happily in France, as in any part of Europe, he resolu'd to add the arte of silke to the felicities of the peace, a speedy and fit remedie to auoyd the transport of gold and siluer. Hereupon hee had the aduice of Commissioners deputed for the establisshing of the trafficke, the which he had choien as well out of his Councell, as of the Soueraigne Courts of Parliament, C Chamber of Accounts, and Court of Ayds. They gaue his Maiesty to vnderstand, that for the more speedie bringing in of this new worke, he must of necessitie begin by the planting of Mulberrie trees, to feed the wormes that weaue and make the silke. And therefore some expert in that Art, did bind themselves to furnish a great number of white Mulberrie trees, and graynes to make Nurseries, in 4. parts of his Realme, at Paris, Orleans, Tours, & Lions, who were bound to make their diuisions by the first day of Aprill this yeare, with instructions how to sowe and plant Trees and Kirnells, to gouerne the wormes, to draw and spinne the silke, to prepare it, and make it readie to be sold. There could not be found in this age a more profitable husbandrie. The people D of Languedoc, Prouence, & Daulphiné, haue found this labour so successefull within these few yeares, as the onely reuenue of silke doth now bring more money to these Provinces, then the Corne, Oyle, and Woode, although they haue great abundance. It doth also begin very happily at Lions, and if it continues, this Cittie wil be as famous for silke, as Tire and Bulis were for Scarlett.

The profit of the art of silke.

The beginning of this yeare was remarkable by a great and tragicall Mutine in the great Turkes Court. In Turkie all the mischeefs which fall out in the publike government, the Spahis and Iannissaries impute vnto the Baschas, and if they do not their duties, they blame him from whome they haue their authoritie. The Seriuano who commanded in Asia, being reuolted against the great Turke, had found such weake resistance

Rebell on in Asia against the Turke.

E as he thought nothing could faile him in his enterprise, so as resolution which is tryed in war, more then in any other action did not faile him. He was so hardie as he came in armes within 3. or 4. dayes journey of Constantinople, wherewith the Spahis and Iannissaries were so moued, as they thought this boldnes proceeded, for that hee had too much of that, whereof their Emperour had too little, and from the treacherie of his Ministers. They conceiued so great a dispight, as they assembled to the number of thirtie fise thousand with the people, and presented themselves before the Diuane or Tribunall of Iustice, the which is held in the great Turkes Pallace, the foure first dayes of the weeke. Hauing set gards at the gates, that they might execute their resolution more safely, they named tenne Spahis, and tenne Iannissaries to deliuer the reasons of this mutinie, and what they desired. As soone as they were entred before the Baschas, whereof the most couragious was not without feare, thinking that the greatest courtesie they could expect from these Barbarians, was that which Plisses attended of Poliphemus, to be deuoured last. They first demanded to haue Assan Bascha deliuered 1603. deliuered vnto them, who thinking his head should serue for a sacrifice to pacifie this A furie, went all amazed through this mutinous multitude, protesting of his Innocency, and calling vpon his Prophet to discouer the truth. Hauing heaped iniuries and re-proches on him, they asked him rudely whence it proceeded, that whilest the chiefe forces of the Empire were in Hungarie to recouer Alba Regalis, they had altogether neglected to stay and ruine the proceedings of the Rebels in Asia. Hee answered that hee had done his dutie whilest that he had the charge of the armie in Asia, but seeing himselfe readie to die, he desired that his death might profit the publike, and that in discharging his Conscience, hee might declare the causes of these ruines. Hee sayd that it proceeded onely from the bad gouernment of the Emperours Mother, and of his Cypriaga. At these words they demanded to speake with the Emperour, B who presented himselfe in the Imperiall seat with the high Priest of the Lawe or Mophy: the Emperour hauing commanded the Mophy, Presidents, the chiefe of the Iustice, and the Doctors of the Law to sit downe, (to great respect is to men of that sort, in a Nation of so small respect) the Baschas standing vp, the chiefe of the seditious presenting himselfe, demanded leaue to speake, which being granted, hee sayd thus. Great, Mighty, and most Happie Emperour, the Spahis and Iannissaries your obedient slaues, full of greefe and compassion to see your Highnes Estate in danger to be lost, desire to know the cause why your greames doth not remedie it, and imploy the means which God hath giuen you. They suppose that the Rebels courses in Asia are vnknowne vnto you, seeing they haue bene so hardie as to come in C armes so nere vnto your Imperiall aboad, without lett or resistance. They desire to know, if all hath bene made knowne vnto him, and if hee will take vpon him the care of the gouernment of this Monarchie, the which by his negligence, is like vnto great members well proportioned, but haue little or no vigour, or if hee be contented that all be dismembred, and euery one to take what share he can.

The Iannissaries power in Turke.

The Iannissaries are they, which may speake boldest in Turkie, they are the reynes of the Empire: the Princes children acknowledge no other Father, nay rather the great Turke is their Creature, for they rayse them vp vnto the Empire, and are bound vnto them, as a Cup of gold is vnto the file, the fizers, and the hammer that workes it. If Mahomet had done as one of his Predecessors aduised in the like mutinie, if hee D had opposed vertue and courage to this furious multitude, it had disperfed of it selfe.
 Hee carried himselfe too couldly, and framed his countenance with a Maiestie full of mildnes, smoothing the choller hee had in his heart, with the best words his tongue could deliuer, imputing the disorder of his affaires, to the Infidelitie of his Ministers, and the disguising of the truth. That before their complaint, hee had resolved to redresse it, and to take from them all occasion of complaint, or to vie any such speech, which was not befitting them, whose example of obedience and respect, should profit the rest of his Subiects. Then they demanded of Assan Bascha, why he had not gi-uen an account of the Rebels proceedings vnto his Highnes? Hee answered that he had neuer sayled of his dutie, but that the Cypriaga had alwayes hindred him from E doing it, saying, that it was not needfull to giue him that distaste, but to repaire the disorders as well as they could. That the cause of all the disorder, proceeded from the Empresse his Mother, and from his Cypriaga. Then the mutiners sayd, that they were there assembled to require their heads, being resolved to take a courte if he refused it, meaning thereby to make an other Emperour. The great Turke answered, that hee would not for their humors, put such as they demanded innocently to death, but they should rest contented to haue it examined by Iustice, if they deferred death: and then he would giue them his owne Sonne if he were culpable. The Mutyners replied, that hee had not put his Brethren to death by Iustice, but for the preferuation of the State: that those which they demanded, were soe guiltie, as the deferred F not to haue their Proesse made; that the Lawes how iust fouer should bee vn-profitable, and Iustice iniurie, if they did not punish them, and therefore it must be so, else they would prouide for it themselves. As for the Empresse his Mother, they were

A were contented she should bee confined to some place a farre of. It is a strange thing 1603. to see a Prince forced by the sedition and mutiny of his subiects, to deliuer an Officer A Prince forced at their discretions. It had bene more Honourable and iust to haue suffered them to edipitate a take him by force, or to haue giuen him means to escape. The violent resolution of multitude these mutiners, made the Emperour wisely to yeeld to what they demanded, causing his Cypriaga and the others to bee brought forth: who presented themselves like men halfe dead. The great Turke doth what he can to saue them, and the mutiners made a terrible and fearefull crie to haue them dispatche. When as they saw their heads, they were satisfied and commended the Princes Iustice, who being moued with the losse of them that were so deere vnto him, hee commanded the Executioner to proceede, and that he should do vnto the chiefe Baschas (who hee knewe were beloued and respected of the Iannissaries) as hee had done vnto his Aga, but their murmures and mutiny were doubled, and the Emperour was forced to temper his choller with patience. The Emperours Mother was referred for the seede of an other reuolt, shee alone commandes in this Empire whilest the Prince doth drowne the warlike vertues of the Ottomans in Delights and Voluptuosnesse. The King of Persia considering the authority of his resolutions, insteade of sending an Ambassador to his Court, two yeares since sent a great Lady, supposing that being brought into the Serrailia, shee of her selfe in speaking to the Empresse should do that which Ambassadors could not Treat but by the participation of many. A woman sent in Ambassage.

C This Accident was seconded soone after by an other much more tragicall. The great Turkes wife being of an Ambitious and insolent humor, (qualities common to that sexe, especially when it is accompanied with great power) seeing these ordinarie mutines against a Prince of small courage and of lesse reuenge, shee cast forth some words amonge her familiars to knowe if her sonne should succede his Father. This was reported vnto Mahomet, who beleued that shee carried more the desire of a bad Wife then the affection of a good Mother. It thrust him into choller, and choller into such fury, as hee imagined she had an intent to poison him, and condemning her (of that whereof nothing but lealoufie and his suspition did accuse her) he caused her to be drowned, and his Sonne to be strangled in his own presence, with some men and women to the number of foureteene that did serue them. Hee sought to disguise this D cruelty with an other reason, saying, that finding the disability of his Sonne for generation, hee would not haue him succede in the Empire, to the ende that the race of the Ottomans which had held the Scepter so many yeares, should not fayle for want of a successor, and that the Lawe of his Prophet, which doth allowe the Turkes (like vnto the Medes) to haue as many Wiues as they can maintayne should not bee vn-profitable to him.

The great Turkes cruelty to his wife and Sonne.

A prodigious lealoufie of soueraigne Command, more violent among the Ottomans, then among all the other Princes of the world. They cannot endure the iust hopes of their Children, and deprive themselves whilest they live of that content which the Father reapes by the presence of his posterity, being the Images of his life. It must needes be an extreame passion, when as it forceth them so brutishly to teare in peeces the Lawes of Nature, & thrustes both Fathers & Children on to such horrible crimes.
 Parricides and Fratricides are not strange in Turky. It seemes their Empire was built vp on this barbarousnes, to murder all that might hinder their Commande, as you may E reade at large in the Turkish History. This blow being giuen to the greatest person of the Empire, amazed all the rest. The Seriuano seeing this Prince to seeke him by all milde courses, durst not refuse it, fearing to trie his cruelty, and as the one promised to forget what was past, so the other sware all obedience & fidelity to come, and to serue him against the Emperour in his Army in Hungary, whether he marched by the straight of Dardanelles with twelue thousand men, hauing first taken possession of the gouern-F ment of Bosne, wherewith Mahomet did recompence his conuincing in, and his returne.
 The taking of Lepante did as much amaze the great Turke, as the losse of a Battaille in the same place did his Grand-father.

They

1603. They beleagued at Constantinople, that Don Iuan of Austria (whom Spain calls the terror A of the Turkes) was risen againe. All that made resistance, were slaine, and all that yielded to saue their liues, lost their liberties. This was the third victory gotten by the valour of the great Master of Malta and of his Knights, in the third year of his Commande.

The voyage to Metz.

The King went to Metz and tooke the Queene with him. The cause of his voyage was the badde Intelligence betwixt Sobole commanding in the Cittadell, and the Inhabitants of the Towne. The Duke of Espernon shew ed in this trouble, as in many other more dangerous, that of the two best things of our life, Happinesse is the first, and Wisdome the second. Sobole was one of them to whome he had yeelded a part of that great and incomparable fauour which he had during the raigne of the deceased King. B Having the Gouernment of Metz from the King, hee made Sobole his Lieutenant of the Towne and Cittadell, in whome hee had as much confidence, as he had vowed his affection vnto him. As the great troubles in the year 1589. had made France like vnto a troubled Riuer, fit for Ambitious men to fish in, so those which held places of importance began to raise their authorities as high as the liberty of the time, and the forgetfulness of the French would suffer them. Two or three yeares after the Duke of Espernon was troubled in Prouence, and his credit crackt with the King. They say that Sobole began then to carry himselfe more proudly then he was wont, vsing no moderation, which is the perfect ornament of prosperity. He suited himselfe to be called Governor. A title which did adde nothing to his profit and commodity, and did breede C him Icalousie with his equalls, badde opinion in the Iudgement of his Superiors, and hatred and feare in the hearts of his Inferiors. There was an other occasion which made his carriage more odious, which was the Pursuite he made against the principall of the Towne, for Treason and Conspiracy. They were freed from prison being Innocent, but they tooke this resolution to free themselves from the command of Sobole. It is the humor of the people to write any good they haue received vpon the Water, and to ingraue the wrongs are done them in brasse. The Duke of Espernon passing by Metz to go to the Spaw, heard great complaints against Sobole, the which hee did but heare, finding that there was some Icalousie of his aboad at Metz, for as often as hee sent for him to eate or play with him, and to bring his Brother with him, the one or the other remained still in the Cittadell. Yet the Duke of Espernon entered into the Cittadell, and was receiued with all the honors he could desire, Sobole presented him the keyes at the gate, protesting of his affection, and complaying of those which sayd he would refuse him the entry: the souldiars stood with their pikes vp, and their Harguebuses and muskets vpon their shoulders, and the Halbards behinde them.

The Duke of Espernon goes againe to Metz.

The Duke of Espernon returned to Court, to vnderstand the Kings pleasure touching these troubles. Hee made a second voyage to Metz. Their murmuring against Sobole was turned into publike complaints, and their complaints into Barricadoes betwixt the Cittadell and the Towne: the Inhabitants were transported with so strange a passion, as they submitted themselves to any thing, so as they might not be commanded by the two Bretheren. This commotion had not lasted long, if it had not bene supported. The presence of the Duke of Espernon gaue them courage, who else would haue bene much amazed. The King first sent Boissize, and then Varanc, both which serued his Maiesty according to his intentions, and disposed Sobole to do whatsoever hee should commande him, declaring notwithstanding that he would not deliuer the place but to himselfe. This was the occasion of the Kings voyage, who went thither in a very vnseasonable time. Vpon the brute of his going many Princes of Germany sent to take vp their lodgings at Metz, who notwithstanding (hearing that the King would make but small aboad, and the time being troublesome) came not out of their Stoues, so as there came not any but the Duke of Denn Ponts, the Landgrane of Hesse, & the Prince of Brandebourg. The King finding the hatred betwixt Sobole and the Inhabitants to bee irreconcilable, was aduised to giue the charge of the Cittadell to Arguen, Lieutenant of the Coronells Company, of the Regiment of his Maiesties guards, and

A and the Lieutenantcy of the gouernment of the Towne and of the Country of Messin 1603. to Montigny his Brother, to hold them as Lieutenants of his Maiesty in the absence of the Duke of Espernon.

The King would not enter into Metz before that Sobole was out of the Cittadell. Some thought hee would not haue bene so obedient, but he shewed hee had no desireigne beyond his dutie. This was a disgrace vnto him: He blamed his Fortune, and Fortune accused his bad carriage. The way hee tooke to maintaine himselfe, overthrew him. Men must hold great Commands like simple Commissions, and not as Inheritances. They must desire them without Passion, and receive them without Infidelity. The King past the feast of Easter at Metz. Where he herd the Iesuits requests B for their reestablishment. They could not finde a better opportunity to speake vnto the King, then that which Varenne (controller generall of the Postes of France) gaue them. Four Iesuits giuing them Intelligence that the King would come to Metz and there spend the Easter. Herevpon foure Iesuits of Pont a Mouzon, were deputed to go and do their dutie vnto his Maiesty, and to renew the request for their returne vnto those places from the which they had bene expelled. They came to Metz on the Wednesday before Easter day, and the next day in the after-noon they had audience in the Kings Cabinet, where as the Duke of Espernon, Villeroy, Genre and Varennes were present. The King receiued them graciously and would not suffer them to kneele, but commanded them to stand vp: and although he takes no delight in long speeches, knowing that they come C prepared with goodly words. Yet he herd father Ignace Armand with patience and attention, who made a long and eloquent Oration as you may reade at large in the Originalls. The King answered them very graciously, I wish no harme to the Iesuits, and all the ill that I wish to any liuing Creature, let it happen vnto my selfe. My Court of Parliament hath done some thing against you, but not without good consideration. Hee received that in writing which they had deliuered by mouth, deliuered it to Villeroy, and hauing considered thereof, he declared vnto them expressly howe desirous he was, and what care he would take for their returne. If your business (sayd he) were not in the Popes hands, I would dispatch you presently, but you know it is not expedient to do any thing without him. I will haue you. You are profitable for the publike and for my Estate. He added moreouer that being at D Paris hee would thinke seriously of their affaires. They demanded if his Maiesty would not be pleased that the three Prouincials of their Company in France, accompanied by three others, should attend there at his returne, and receiue his Commandements. There needes not so many sayd the King, it shalbe sufficient that you and father Cotton come. The King made this voyage partly to pacifie some trouble growne betwixt the Cardinall of Lorraine and the Prince of Brandebourg for the Bishoprike of Strausbourg, and this was the cause of their quarrell. The Bishoprike of Strausbourg becom void by the decease of their Bishop (who was a Catholike) the Cardinall of Lorraine obtrayned the grant thereof from his Holinesse. But for that they of Strausbourg since the sturres in Germany, had held the confession of Aufbourg, the deceased Bishop had retired himselfe out of the City, and liued at a house of his in the Country in his Religion. & yet notwithstanding he receiued his temporall reuenues from them of Strausbourg. On the other side the Marquis of Brandebourg Elector of the Empire, had obtained an Election from them of Strausbourg for one of his Sonnes, who being named to the Bishoprike and receiued by them of Strausbourg, he will inioy the Bishops rights without any other ceremony. The Cardinall on the other side hauing obserued the accustomed Order therein, demanded the Bishops rights of them of Strausbourg, such as his Predecessor inioyed, who died a Catholike, and according to the Article of the Interim set downe by the Confession of Aufbourg. Herevpon they of Strausbourg made some difficulty, & the rather for that being neighbours vnto the Duke of Lorraines territories, they haue often many controuersies to decide as it doth comonly fall out betwixt Neighbours. They had also giuen their consent to the nomination of the Prince of Brandebourg for Superintendent or Administrator, that is to say Bishop after their manner, for these and other priuate reasons they refused the Cardinalls demande.

The

1603. The Prince of Brandebourg gets possession, and prepares to withstand the Cardinal, A all things tending vnto Armes. Many and great Leuies of men were made on eyther side. Those of Strasbourg were also in Alarme, seeking to preuent al disorders if it were possible, yet fauoring the Prince of Brandebourg more then the Cardinal of Lorraine.
The Emperour had written vnto them both, declaring that his Intention was, that neither of them should haue wrong. The King was intreated to interpose his authority as a Friend to both parties, for the auoyding of all scandall. The Prince of Brandebourg named Bishop of Strasbourg, was come into France some monethes before: And they say hee remayned some daies at Troyes, vntill his Maiesty had assigned him a time and place to haue the Honor to come & kisse his hands, the which was done at Loges neere to Saint Germain in Laye, where the King gaue him audience, and so the sayd Prince B was dispatched, with promise of all fauour, to compound the Controuerfie betwixt him and the Cardinall.

During the Kings abode at Metz, the sayd Prince of Brandebourg came accompanied with the Lantgrau of Hesse, the Duke of Deux Ponts, and a Deputy from the Arch-bishop of Treues Elector of the Empire: and by their aduice it was determined, that the Cardinal should haue a portion out of the sayd Bishop-ricke, and the rest should remaine vnto the Prince, and by that meanes they should continue friends as before. Thus a Peace was made betwixt them, the which might elie haue bene preiudiciall to the whole Empire and to all Christendome. The King went from Metz to Nancy to see the Duchesse of Bar his sister, and the Duke of Lorraine. At that time a marriage was concluded betwixt the Duke of Deux Ponts and the Ladie Katherine of Rohan, remaying then with the Kings sister, and so hauing provided for all things necessary for the frontier, hee tooke his way to Paris the 7. of Aprill. It is a signe of a happy Raigne when the subiect reioyceth to see his King: Prouence had been possessed with this desire fifteene yeares, beeing the onely Prouince of all France that had not yet seene the King. He was expected there with great Impatiency, hauing promised after his returne from Metz to go thither. As it was reasonable to giue comfort to that Prouince, so was it necessary to fortifie that Coast, and to haue an eye to the deseignes of the Sea Army of Spaine, which vnder collour of attempting some-thing vpon upon Alger, might fall vpon that Coast, by which the Emperour Charles the first held it the easiest to inuade France. The Honour of Christendome made all men to wish that this enterprife had bene more happy then the rest. But as oftentimes bad desseignes prosper better then good, the successe depending much vpon blinde fortune, this en-terprife of Alger had no better successe then the two former. It was managed by a Franciscan Friar, who promised vnto him selfe as great Glory in expelling these petty Kings of Affrike as Aratus receiued hauing purged Sicily from Tyrants. Hee had a promise from the King of Cuccio, not onely to fauour it, but also to declare himselfe openly, and to reduce Alger to what extremity they would. Vpon this assurance the Vice-roye of Maierque approached with foure Gallies. Hee landed foure score men to deliuer forty thousand Crownes vnto the Moors vpon the bargain, and to put their desseigne in execution, but they were, (eyther by hazard, or for that they wanted courage to do as they had sayd) taken and deliuered vnto the enemies. Many thought it was a grosse Treason. Treachery is as inseperable to a Moors Heart, as blackenesse is to his Body. It was wisely done of the Vice-roye to retire himselfe, without bragging. This disapointed the Kings pretended voiage into Prouence. It is true that the passage of the three Princes of Sauoy into Spaine, wherof the Duke gaue the King intelligence by the Count of Viesque reuiued many Icalousies. The Duke was at Nice with them expecting the commodity of their imbarcking, the Princeesse Marguerite, his eldest Daughter commanding in Piedmont. They attended the Kings commandements at Barcellona, and were there receiued with all the Honours that might bee doneto Princes so allyed. The King of Spaine sent D. Henriquez Guzman vnto them, to congratulate their arriuall, and to aduise them to make small iorneyes for the heate of the season. He gaue vnto Prince Victor the Dukes second Sonne, the Vice-royes place of his great Grandmother. At the same time report which carries all things abroad without distinction or iudgement, did publish throughout Europe, a Newes happily false; which was that the King had bene extremely sicke. Hee was indeede sicke, but not so extremely as they should so iudge of him. Hee was soone restored to his naturall health, and returned to his ordinary manner of Lying. The actions of Princes must be alwayes great: not busying themselves in making of Lanthornes like to that King of Macedonia. They must alwayes hold their Subiects in this opinion that in doing nothing, they doe some great worke. It was a great precept, which the Emperour Charles the first, gaue to King Philip his Sonne, alwayes to B exercise himselfe in some vertue, agreeing with the dutie of a King, to hold the subiects as it were in admiration of his effects, and not to giue their thoughts any time to fill them with other affections. When occasions of Warre cease, they must aplie themselves to those of Peace, as to the administering of Iustice and ording of his Realme. To conclude, all the actions of a Prince must tend to the good and helth of his people, for whome hee liues more then for himselfe, as the Sonne doth not shine and giue heate but for Men and the Elements. During the Warre no man enquired what the King did, his great affaires, provided store of worke, the ende of one enterprife was the beginning of another. Nowe that these seditious stormes are appeased, that the waues are smooth and the Sea calme; that Peace giues him a rest worthie of his labours, that so many paines past, make his pleasures more sweete, C and that the rewarde of vertue makes his Triumphes seeme more glorious, their passeth no day but some one asketh, what doth the King? They neede not studie for an answere, hee is alwayes in action farre from Idleness. The cheefe action is neuer to bee without action, hee hath bene so bred vp from his Cradle, hee cannot be other wise: Bees neuer become droanes, great spirits doe neuer degenerate, wee shall see him on Horse-backe at the age of Massaniusa, hee will be fearefull to his enemies as that of Agesilaus, hee will shewe himselfe in the head of his Armies at the age of four score yeares, like vnto Phocion, his valour will neuer growe olde no more then his memorie.

D Hee contents himselfe notwithstanding to inioye the fruites of Peace, and not to thinke any more of Warre vlesse he be wronged. One of the greatest contentments the Peace doth yeeld him is that of his buildings, and there is no exercise more worthie of a King then to repaire the ruines of time, when as they bee buildings which regard the Glory of the Prince, and the common profit of the people, when as the Mor-tarter is not made with the bloud and sweat of his poore subiects. At one time the King had Masons in diuers places, in the great Church of Orleans, at Fontainebleau, at Saint Germain, at Monceaux, and at the newe bridge at Paris. A'l great workes, whether that wee consider the building by the desseigne, or the desseigne by the building.
Among manie merueilles of his life that was admirable, that hee did bulde and E make Warre both together. The first daie hee entred into the Louure hee did deseigne and set downe what he hath since continued. He hath made Saint Germain and Fontainebleau (two houses of the Kings his Predecessors) royall and stately Pallaces. He finished in the hottest of the Vares and forraine tempests, that which they had vndertaken in a calme and Peacefull season.

Wee haue seene what the King does, wee must also knowe where vnto the Court is inclyned. Howe can they liue without Warre, that thinke it a dishonor to die in their beddes, who are accustomed to triumphe ouer Idleness, and rest not but to take newe breath. What doe so many Noblemen, which cannot endure rest but with impatience? Some goe a hunting, others dwell and die among Ladies: Many giue F themselves to the knowledge of Tongues and the Mathematikes: the most quarrelous stripp themselves into their shirtes, notwithstanding any prohibition of Duells or Combats: the most temperate retire themselves from great expences. Some 1603. there are who loth that ease should triumph ouer their reputations goe out of the Realme with the Kings permission. It is a signe of a great and Noble courage to go and make Warre vpon a forraigne Theater, and to see the diuersity of People and Nations, that hee may settle his Iudgement and Arme himselfe with experience. When wee speake of them that haue well imployed the ease and libertie of Peace, we must remember the Duke of Newers. He went into England, Flanders and Hungary, and through a great part of the North. Hee past to the King of Denmarke, who (for the respect of those two great and famous houses, of Gonzage allied to the greatest houses of Europe and of Newers, which carries the title of Dukes of Brabant and Limbourg but much more for the Loue of this Crowne) receiued him with great and famous Honours.

A League concluded between the Venetians and the Grisons.

The King was aduertised that the Seigneury of Venice would renew a negotiation which they had attempted and left vnperfect twenty yeares since, which they nowe sought to conclude. De Vic Ambassador for the King in Suifferland hauing discovered that both parties had begun without the King, gaue them to vnderstand that they could not synish nor conclude that without his Maiestie. The Count Fuentes did also crosse it, for that this new League should make him to loose the hope of that which the Spaniards had pursued so many yeares. As soone as the King had giuen them to vnderstand that hee was well pleased therewith, it was concluded: neither partie respecting the threatres of the Count Fuentes, who sware that hee would take from the Grisons the traffick which they had in the Duchie of Milan, and the releefe of Come which they receiued from thence. The Articles of this Alliance are sett downe at large in Peter Mathewe. The Count Fuentes discontented with this League, made the Grisons repent it, hauing cut of their Commerce and all commodities which they drew out of the territories of Milan, without the which they could not well liue. The two Countries ioyne together, and the Barrenes of the one is supplied by the Fertility and abundance of the other. To bring them vnder the yoke of Spaine, and to force them to breake with the Venetians, hee built a fort at the entry of their Country, whereof shalbe spoken hereafter.

An Ambassador sent from Venice into France about the same time past by Lions, a graue and wife man, and well practised in affaires of State. The Governor of Lions did visite him, & among other discourses vnderstood from him that the Seigneuries of that Common-weale did hold themselves more bound vnto the Count Fuentes then to any man liuing, for that they had made vse of his threatres to sharpen their courages which time had made blunt and dull. His braueries had made them to take resolutions for the good of the State which they had neuer drempt of, drowning their Countells in the delights of Peace, and presuming that they should not feare any storme in so great a Calme, but hauing seen the Counts humor to stirre vp Warre in Italie, and that he bragged hee had Instruments to draw them in that had no will to dance, they had so well provided for their affaires, as they feared his hand no more then his tongue.

The navigation of the French to new France or Canada.

The last yeare the Lord of Pont had bene in newe France (called Canada) from whence hee had brought two Sauages, which hee presented vnto the King: they learned of them that the great Ruer which they thought to haue bene but a Gulfe (for that it is eightene leagues broad where it enters into the Sea) was about foure hundred leagues long, and past through many goodly Countries and Lakes, into the which many other goodly Riuers did runne, and that hee might goe vp into it in Canowes, which the Sauages do vse to sayle in that Ruer. Hee reloued with some other Sea Captaines (with the Kings good liking) to returne, and to search into the hart of the Country by meanes of the Sauages, as well as he had discovered along the Sea Coast, where is nothing but Rockes and high Mountaynes, and sands full of Pyntrees, Sapins, Cipres and Holley. He parted from Honfleur the 15. of March, carrying the 2. Sauages back with him, and the 18. of April he came into the great Ruer of Canada, where hauing entred a 100. leagues, in the end he came to Tadoussac the 24. where he

A he found many Sauages in Cabines. Going on land, he went with some of his compa- 1603. nie to the Cabin of the great Sagamo, called Anadabijon, where they found him, with some foure score or a hundred of his companions, which made Tabagie (that is to say, a Feast) who receiued them very well, according to their custome, and made them to sit neere him, all the Sauages being placed one by another on either side of the Cabin. One of the Sauages which he had carried with him, began to make his oration, of the good reception which the King had made them, and of the good usage which they had receiued in France, and that his Maiestie wished them well, and desired to people their land, and to make peace with their enemies (which be the Trocois) or to send them forces to vanquish them. He told them of the goodly Castels, Palaces, houses and people that he had seene, and the manner of liuing of the French. The Sauages gaue him audience with great silence: When he had done speaking, the great Sagamo began to take Tobacco, and gaue some vnto the Seignieur of Pont Graue of S. Male, and to his company, and to some other Samagos that were neere him. hauing taken it well, hee began to make his Oration to them all, speaking deliberately, staying sometimes a little, and then beginning againe, he said. That in truth they had reason to be greatly contented to haue such a King for their great friend: Wherevnto all the other Sauages answered with one voyce, ho, ho, ho; that is to say, I, I. Then the Sagamo sayd againe, That he was very glad the King of France should people their Land, and make Warre against their enemies: That there was no Nation in the world to whom they desired more good, then vnto the French: Then hee gaue the Sauages to vnderstand, what profit they might receiue from his Maiestie.

After that hee had ended his speech, Du Pont and his companie went out of the Cabin, and then they began to make their Tabagie or feast, the which is done with the flesh of Orignac, that is like vnto Beefe of Beares, Sea Volues, and Beauers, which is the ordinary meate which they haue, with great store of wilde-fowle. When they eate, they sitte of eyther side of the Cabin, euery one hauing a Dish made of the Barke of Trees: the meate being foddren, there is one that giues to euery one his portion in his Dish, where they eate very grosely, for when their hands are greasie, they eyther rubbe them vpon their hayre, or vpon their Dogges, (whereof they haue great store to hunt withall. Before they eate they dance about their Pannes, and after they haue eaten, they returne to their dancing, euery one taking the head of his enemy which hee hath slaine in Battaille, the which hangs behind him. They made this Feast together, for the victorie which they had obtained of the Trocois, of whome they had slaine some hundred. Three Nations of Sauages were there assembled, that is to say, the Estechemins, Algonnequins, and Montagnez, to the number of a thousand, all enemies to the Trocois, against whome they make cruell warre by surprise, for that they are more in number then they. The 13. day of the Moneth, the sayde Sauages which were then at the point of Saint Mathew, came to Campe at the Port of Tadoussac, where the Frenchmen were. At the breake of day, their great Sagamo going out of his Cabin, went about all the other Cabins, crying with a lowd voyce, that they must dislodge to goe to Tadoussac, where their good friends were. Sodenly euery one pulled downe his Cabin, and the great Sagamo beganne first of all to take his Canow, and to carrie it to the Ruer, in the which hee imbar- ked his Wife and Children, with great store of Furrres, so as they were neere two hundred Canowes, which goe exceeding swiftly, for although Du Ponts Shippe Boate were very well manned, yet they went faster then it. There are but two persons that doe rowe, the man and the woman. Their Canowes are eight or nine paces long, and one broad, they are very subiect to ouer-turne, if they be not well guided: They are made of Barkes of Trees, strengthened within with little hoopes artificially made, and they are so light, as a man may carry one easily: and euery Canowe will carry the weight of a Pipe. Their Cabins are fowe made like Tents, couered with Barkes of Trees, leauing a hole open in the toppes, to let in the light: Rrrrr 2. they

The manner of their Cabins.

1604. The manner of their Cabines. they make many fiers in the midst of the Cabine, whereas sometimes they are famelies together. They lie vpon skins one among an other, and their Dogges with them. All these people are of a pleasant humor, they laugh most commonly, yet they are some-what Saturnists: they speake deliberately, as if they would be well vnderstood, and stay soderly, studying a good space, and then they speake againe. They vse the Customes in their Orations in Councel, whether none come but the Principall, which are Ancients, the women and Children assist not. All these Nations endure so much some-times, as they are in a manner forced to eate one an other through the great cold and snowe, for the Beasts and Fowle which they vse, retire themselves into the hotter Countries. They are apt inough to learne to till the ground or any other worke, if they may be taught. Many of them are of good iudgement, and will answer directly to any question. They are full of reuenge and great Liars, in whome there is no trust, they promise much and performe little, for the most part they haue no Lawe, & beleue that after that God had made all things, hee tooke a number of Arrows and stickt them in the Earth, from the which sprong Men and Women which haue multiplied in the world vnto this day, and are growne in this sort. That there is one God, one Sonne, the Mother and the Sunne which shines which are foure, yet that God is aboue all, and that the Sonne and the shyning Sonne are good, by reason of the benefit which they receiue, but the Mother is nothing worth, for that she eats them. In like sort they hold that the Father is not very good. They haue an infinite number of other foolish opinions, and they haue certaine Sauages among them, whom they call Pilotona, which speake visibly vnto the Diuill, and tells them what they should do, as well for matters of Warre as other things: to whom they obey at their first command. They also beleue that all their dreames are true, and many say that they haue scene & dempt what should happen, but to speake truly they are illusions of the Diuill which abuseth them.

They talke vnto the Diuill.

Their complexions appareil, marriages and interments.

They are all well proportioned, without any deformity of their bodies, and nimble. Their women are well fashioned, repleat & some-what full: they are yelow by reason of the painting wherewith they annoint themselves, which makes them of an Oliue collour. They appareil themselves with skins, one part of their bodies is couered and the rest bare. In winter they couer themselves with good Furies, wherof they haue great store, where there is great store of snowe, they vse a kinde of racket, the which is wise or thrife as bigge as that of France, which they tie vnto their feete, and so go in the snowe without sinking, for else they could not hunt, nor goe in many places.

They haue a kinde of marriage, when a maide is foureteeene or fiftene yeares olde she may haue as many seruants & friends, and accompany with as many as she pleases; then after five or six yeares, shee will take whome she likes best for her Husband, and liue together till death, ylesse after some-time they haue no Children, then the Man, may be vnmarried and take an other Wife. After they be once married they are chaste, and the Husbands are for the most part ialous, giuing presents to the Father or kinfolkes of the Woman whome they haue married. As for their Interments or Burialls, when a man or a Woman dieth, they make a pit, into the which they pural the goods he hath, as Kettles, Furies, Hatchets, Bowes, Arrows, Aparel and other things, and then they put the bodie into the pit and couer it with Earth, on the which they lay great peeces of wood, and one peece they set right vp, the which they painte redde on the toppe. They beleue the immortality of the Soule, and say that they go to reioyce in other Countries with their kinfolkes and friends when they are dead. The Seigneur of Pont hauing spent some-time to discouer the great Riuier of Canada, and some other particularities of the Countrye, returned the 24. of August, and arrived at Newe-hauen the 20. of September.

In the beginning of this year Moses Sikel being revolted from the Emperour, entred into Transilvania with great troups of Turkes, Tartarians and Polonians. Many Gentlemen of the Country more through base cowardise then through treachery ioyned

A ioyned with him, and through their Intelligence Alba Iulia was surpris'd, but God who neuer shewes the greatnesse of his power in small things, and who sends helpe when there is least hope, would not suffer his enemies to be long proud with the prosperity of their affaires. In September George Basta and Raduill Vanoide of Valachia, came to fight with him. The Battaille was furious and bloody. Basta sayd vnto his soldiars before the charge, that it was not needefull to perswade great resolutions, but he did encourage them more by his example, pressing into those places where there was most perill, necessity and glory. The Christians had the victory. They had the field, the triumph & the spoyle. They sent a hundred & two & twenty Enseignes to the Emperour being at Prague, the which were carried by three and three in a ranke. There were two with the white Eagle of Polonia, the which were not set vp for the respect of the Polonians. The booty was great in Prisoners, Horses, Armes and Cannon. They had found no place of reuerce, if the victor had not stayed the course of his victory contenting himselfe to preserve that in safety, which hee could not aduance but with danger. They retired themselves to Temisvarr a Towne which had been held these fifty yeares by the Turkes, wherof the Emperour of Turkie neuer speakes, but he giues it the title of Inuincible. Basta was resolved to beseege it, or to raise vp his sepulcher vnder the ruines thereof. But hee could not keepe Buda from being victuelled, where about the end of September they lost about 2000. men which was the flower of all their horsemen.

The Turkes defeated.

The great Turke (seeing the great exploits which the French had done in the Warres of Hungary and Transilvania) had often intreated the King not to suffer any French to go to the Warres of Hungary, and to tie him to make a strict Prohibition, he granted all and more then his Maiesty could desire for the reparation of publicke and priuate Injuries, against the liberty of the Commerce, and the safety of the navigation in the Leuant Seas, the which were greatly molested by Pirates. Hee sent a Chaoirs (which is a Generall or a Conductor of a Carauane) vnto the King in September, with very kinde letters, and of a stile not vsuall for the Princes of the house of Ottomans, who speake as Turkes, and Glorie to speake proudly and Imperiously to the Potentates of Christendome, giuing him this title. To the most Glorious

D magnanimous and great Lord of the beleefe of Iesus. Elected among the Princes of the Nation of Messias, the Compounder of controuersies which happen among Christians, Lord of greatnesse, Maiesty and riches, and the cleere guide of the greatest, Henry the fourth Emperour of France, that hee may ende his daies with Peace and Happinesse. The letter I omit for breuities sake, being not greatly pertinent to this subiect. And for that the great Turke was informed, that the Pirates of Algier and of Thunis, made markets of the French, which they tooke, and sold them vnto the Moors (who were alwaies cruell and mercilesse vnto the Christians, being forced to endure all without complaining, and to murmure against the rigour which Fortune allowses the Master ouer his slaue) hee writ to Amet King of Fes, and intreates him to preuent this sale, as against the Iustice that was left them by their Prophet, and to set all the Frenchmen that were in his dominions at libertie. The King labored to conuert the Warre of Hungary into a long truce or an Honourable Peace for the Christians. Hee disposed Mahomet therevnto by the dexteritie of his Ambassador; and if the house of Austria had trusted that of France, they had reaped the fruites of this Negotiation. Mahomet to shewe that he had a desire to lay a side Armes, presented the Emperour with Armes and Horses, and to Mathias the Arch-duke hee sent a Rich robe for a present.

The Turkes title to the France King.

This Mahomet had so abandoned himselfe to all voluptuousnesse and pleasures, as hee had no other feeling but for the tast and delights of the flesh. Hee had a bodie as bigge as a hogshed of Wine, in the which his spirit could neuer bee drie, to make vse of Wisdome and Reason. To this Mahomet the third, his Sonne Amet the first (being a young Infante) succeeded. There was no take in Court but of the quarrell betwix the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny, the which was very hard

A quarrell betwix the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny.

1603. to reconcile. It grew vpon words reported and disauowed. The Count Soissons was much offended, many framed diuers Metheors in their heads, vpon the consequence of this question, some there were that were made damnable vowes, the which were as Odious and as punishable, as those sellers of Funerall stufes that were punished by the Senate of Athens vpon the Accufation of Demades. The King forseeing that his seruice did suffer in this diuision, gaue him to vnderstand by the Chancellor and Sillery, and afterwards by the Count of Saint Paul, and the Duke of Montbazon, that he desired this trouble were ended and hee satisfied. hee answered them all after one sort, That hee should hold himselfe unworthy of the honour to bee as hee was a neere Kinsman to so great and conragious a King, if hee had no feeling of so bloody an Iniury. The King considering that this quarrell did nothing aduance his seruice, he made himselfe the instrument of this reconciliation. Hee sent for the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rheims to the Loure. They came both well accompanied. The Presence, Authority, and intreary of his Maiesty, was of Force to smother the remembrance of all iniuries, and to reconcile their willes. Let vs now see what they haue done in the Nationall Synode helde at Gap, held by them of the reformed Religion, whereas many beleueed that in giuing audience to Ambassadors, and receiuing Letters from Foraine Princes and Common weales, they had done more then their condition would allowe, and had taken the way to make an Estate in the Estate. I will say no more. The passion of Religion might diminish the beleefe of the Trueth. The Synode began the first of October. C It treated of things touching Doctrine, Discipline, and the Gouernement of the Churches, giuing a good Testimony that there are among them men full of zeale to the aduancement of their Religion, and who in their Resolutions can ioyne Wisdome with Doctrine, causing them to blushe that haue so much suffered the ancient constitutions of the Church to degenerate, and haue so much neglected the Gouernement and Discipline, as the Synodall Assemblies of Diocesses, so necessary and profitable, are nothing but vaine and fond Ceremonies, where they doe onely exhort them to do well hereafter, not caring to correct or amende the ill that is gone and past.

They are reconciled by the King.

A Synod held at Gap.

The profit of Synodes.

Of many meanes which the Church (in her infancy) did vse to preserve this spirit of Peace and Charity, which gaue life vnto all the members, and intaintained the Cymment and bond of the whole building, that of these Assemblies hath bene held the most fruitfull, and should bee made twice a yeare, if they will follow the Canons of the Apostles and the Decrees of Nice and Sardinia. There they conferred of the Order and Direction of all affayres. There the Pastors taking knowledge one of an other enterrayned their friendships, renuyng the bonds of their affections. It serued for a bloud-letting, and a good purgation for badde humours in a corrupted Body, to preserve and keepe it in Health, Puritye, and Chastetye of the Fayth. There they shewed the power of the Spirituall Sword vpon the incorrigible, who in the end found the pappes of the Church drye for them, when through Errour, Malice, or Obstinacy, they made themselves unworthy of the sweetness of her Milke. There in the end they did strayne the strings of the Policy and Discipline of the Church, the which beeing through negligence growne slacke made no Sounde nor Harmony. In this assembly of Gap, (after that all the Deputies of the Prouinces of the Realme had shewed their Commissions) they began by the Inuocation of the name of GOD, the which was followed by the reading of the confession of the Fayth, wherein they did expound those things that were not playne enough. The common desire of the Ministers to see the schisme pacified that was betwixt them and the other Congregations of Germany, England and the Low Countreys, made them resolute that the Assembly should write vnto the Vniuersities both Lutherans and Caluinists, to devise some meanes to reconcile these contrarieties in some poynts of their confession.

This yeare the King did graue in the register of his vertues, a memorable example of Iustice.

A Iustice. The cause is considerable and the subiect of consequence. A yong gentlewoman of Normandie visited and courted by her Brother, did dayned her husband, by whome she had two Children, for that he was some-what aged and made no profession of Armes. This inequality of age together with his condition, made the Coniugall affection like vnto a small Brooke, whereof when the spring is stoppt the bedde remains drie, and there is nothing left but filthe for Toades and Froges. The Greene grasse that was vpon the bankes withereth: yea the trees that were planted along, die. This marriage, hauing lost the radicall humor of Loue, made all pleasure and content to wither, produced nothing but noise, disdain, contempt and quarrell. This miserable woman cared no more for her husband, but to drawe meanes from him to make her selfe more pleasing in the eyes of an other, delighting in Luxurioufnesse and excessse of Apparell, vnder the which the Diuill is accustomed to make open Warre to Chastetie, and to rauish the Honour of a woman, without the which her life is a life without a Bodie, a Bodie without a Soule, a Soule without a Spirit, a Spirit without Breth, and a Breth without Aire.

1603. A memorable example of a crime and of Iustice.

It seemed that the first acquaintance of this woman with her Brother, was nothing but a perfect Loue, such as Honour and that which they were one vnto another might well allowe. Who so had seene the familiarities of this Sister with her Brother, would not haue beleueed that they had made Loue, the Lawe of Nature beeing of greater force then Reason, or Truth it selfe. In the meane tyme this furie prouoked Adultery and Incest, making the Wife to abandon the Company of her Husband to cleaue vnto her Brother, who forgetting nothing that might be layd or done to couer his crime and to auoyde punishment, wandred vp and downe the Countrey with her vnder disguised names, but carrying still in his Conscience the sting and vicer of so execrable a pleasure. She grew bigge with Childe, and beleueing that in hiding her great Beilie, her offence should bee also hidden, shee caused her selfe to bee conducted into that great forest of Paris, where she continued with her Brother the exercises of Cupid and Psyche. The figge leaues could not couer their shame. The all-seeing eye of the diuine Iustice discouers them, and will not suffer that so infamous a Lust should continue. These violent streames beeing runne out, the Mudde and filthe that was in the bottom appered presently. The husband oppressed with so iusta grieffe, (as the Lawe doth not hold him punishable, whom it forceth to kill, the Wife beeing surprisid in Adultery) came to Paris, and discouered those which had deprived him both of rest and Honour, hee causeth them to be apprehended and committed prisoners, the one in the great Chastelet, the other in Tour l'Euesques. The Sister confesseth her selfe guilty of Adultery to free her Brother from Incest, laying the Childe to one that was altogether innocent. Vpon the difficulty of proofes the Lieutenant Criminall condemned them both to the racke. Hee might well haue proceeded to sentence. But considering that they must deliberate well, before they iudge of the life of a Man which is not made without care, he desired rather to proceed coldly therein then ouerboly. The Husband whose heart could not be moued to pittie, by the consideration of his two Children, appeals from this sentence of the racke. The Court considering that mildenesse doth nourish and giues more scope to vice, declares the appellation and sentence from the which he had appealed to be void, and amending it, they iudge the accused sufficiently conuicted of the crimes of Adultery and Incest, for satisfaction whereof they condemn them to loose their heads.

A sentence given by the Lieutenant Criminell.

A sentence of the Court.

The King during the Processe was often sued vnto for their pardon. But considering that in such Crimes it were impiety to shewe pittie: that mildenesse was severity, and clemency cruel, and that the most holie and the most iust of his Predecessors, reuoked a pardon which hee had giuen to a malefactor, falling vpon that verse of the Prophet David in his praier-booke. Doe Iustice at all times. Sayd, that hee referred it to the Iustice of his Count of Parliament. The Father desired to change the infamie of the punishment into a death lesse shameful, but longer and more cruell, Hee offered all his Lands to procure his Children that manner of punishment. This could not be, for that by the doome of the Iudgement, the execution was to be done at the Greue, where it moued pity and compassion in many, lamenting the youth of the Brother, the beauty of the Sister and the misery and blindness of them both. The yeare ended in Peace as it had begunne in pleasures and sports, there was no newe occasion offered, but the passage of the Constable of Castille to go into England for the conclusion of the Treaty of Peace betwixt the Kings of England and Spaine. The King aduertised of his passage by Bordeaux, sent to the Marshall d'Ornano to receiue him, the which he did, going to meet him with a great number of Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Country. The Emperor Charles the 5. passing through France, admitted the great and goodly Traynes of Gouernors of Prouinces which came to receiue him, commending them very much. The Constable of Castille (tuller of these Spanish fumes) made no great account thereof, and receiued these honours after a Spanish manner. The Marshall d'Ornano enter-tayning him with the singularities of this Realme, told him, That hee should see a Country, yea a World in seeing Paris. He answered him, That he had left behinde his backe the goodliest Citties of Christendome. But they are not so Great nor so well peopled, saide the Marshall d'Ornano. The People answered the Constable, Adde nothing to the excellency of Citties, although it helpe somewhat for the strength of the State. The Marshall asked him, If he would not see the King. He thowed by his answer, That he was not greatly curious, yet must hee see him, with the respect that was due to that Maiesty. Hee came to Paris with a great Trayne. The King of Spaine spares no cost in such occasions, and thinks no expences more royall, then those which makes his Golde to glister in the Eyes of strangers. In like sort, his Ministers and Ambassadors seeing themselves so well followed and ferued, take delight in shewing the greatnesse of their Maister, and are not silent when they must publish his power. Mendoza who neuer went out off his Lodging but on Horse-backe, in Litter, or in Carosse, with all his Traine, although it were but to go to the Church, the which was very neere his Lodging, hee neuer spake three words, but two were for the greatnesse of his Maister, saying often; That God was mighty in Heauen, and the King of Spaine on Earth. An other going out of Rome to accompany the Pope, went with sixe Litters, six Carosses, euery one hauing six Horles, two hundred Gromes, and three score Carts for baggage, and all for a small iourney. The Prince of *Parma*s Traine, was admirable and royall, shewing by his equipage the greatnesse of his Maister whom he ferued. The Constable of Castille did not hide it, neither in his Wordes, nor in his Traine, hee had alwayes some wordes of ostentation to shewe it.

He went to the Loure and did see the King in his Cabiner, he entred with a good Grace, but statly and proude, the which was sodenly conuerted into great humility, for approaching neere vnto his Maiesty (who was sitting in a Chayre) he kneeled vpon one knee, and continued so a little longer then hee thought. The King tooke him vp, embraced him, and shewed him a very good Countenance. He spake much to assure him, that the King of Spaine held nothing more deere, then the preservation of the Peace; and vnlesse that time should greatly force his will, hee had no other power, but to continue it in this Resolution, and to bring forth fruites of great Loue and Friendship, the which is firme and constant betwixt equal powers. Hee heard from the King wordes of the same affection: then he tooke his leave to go see the Queene. Going downe to crosse the Court, where he was attended by his people with forty Torchets of white Waxe, hee said to some of his Company, That the King had receiued him with the Maiesty of a King, and had embraced him as his Kinsman.

Hauing done his duty vnto the Queene, he demanded leaue to go and see the Dauphin. The King caused him to be conducted the next day to S. Germaine. Being arriued there, the gaue notice to his Gouernesse, that the Constable was there with a great Traine of Spaniards. At that word of Spaniards, the little Prince opened his eyes and makes Amakes them speak it againe. They be Spaniards that come to see you, Spaniards said the Prince? ça ça giue me my sword. Who so had not known that this word came from his own mouth, would haue thought that they had printed in his fantasie the same opinion which King Charles the leuenth, Lewis the eleuenth, and Charles the eight had had in thier infancie of the English and Bourguignons. And if the Spaniards had heard him, the strangenes of such a word would haue caused them to apprehend new worke, and to feare and beleene that which the French souldiar faith, that they must present Milan for the first tryall of this yong Eaglet. The Constable admired his constant eye, and his Physiognomie, and was amazed at so great a boldnesse in that age, and so much Iudgement in that Infancie. Monsieur the Dauphin told him tales in his language, and according to his vnderstanding, as Alexander did to the Ambassadors of Perfit. All the Spaniards did meruaile, and the more for that the dore was open for the least of the trayne. They see about him a goodly companie of young Noblemen, Alexander Monsieur, the Prince of Longueuille, and the three sonnes of the Duke of Espernon. The Constable of Castille past on to goe into Flanders, he came to Bruxelles and descended at the Archdukes Pallace, where he was well receiued, and from thence hee past into Flanders. Although the subiect ought not to reckon the yeares of his Prince, but to wish him a long and prosperous life, yet we must say that with the end of the last yeare the King began the foure and fifteth yeare of his age, a tearme which Cato held to bee ripe and well aduanced, whereunto few Kings of France had atteyned, and yet it hath nothing abated the vigour and strength of this Prince, who is active and disposed, and as liuely as hee was at the age of thirte yeares. Cares and yeares hauing only made his beard white, it is true that now he begins to feele some flux of the gout. A disease which breeds with ease, and which comes to Princes rather by excesse, then by trauell in their youth, and which is sooner gotten by the ease of Venus, then by that of Diana, there beeing no pleasure in the world which doth not carrie some displeasure behind it. The best course is to repent the euill before they commit it, that is to say, to haue onely intented it, and the meanes to growe old is neither to doe nor to eate any thing through voluptuousnes. A great Condition or Qualitie to whom all things are lawfull that please, will find this rule of gouernment very hard. Great men commit great excesse, and in the end they tast the fruits which they haue sowne. It is reason that after a time infirmities should cease, and cleere the troubles of their soules, as thunder and lightning doth purge the ayre, that diseases as fore-runners of death, and porters of the prison, wherein they are inclosed, should teach them that are men, and subiect to humane miseries, that they are not raysed vpon the clouds, to be free from a world of miseries, that are disperseed vpon the earth, and that they should remember that the more their delights abound, the more their strength decays, and that hee that doth least, doth least harme, and passeth the last yeares of his life with more content and lesse greefe. The King would not complaine much of that little touch of the gout, for that it had bene but gentle, and when that after his recouerie, the Courtiers did see him to weare furred boots, they sayed it was more to hould the greene in some reputation, then for any need he had. Hee did a publike Act which hath particularities worthe to bee knowne. I doe not forget these occasions, for that they supplie the discourse of this Histone, without the which it should bee constrained to seeke for matter faire without the Realme, for of secret things and which are treated of in the Councel of the Cabaner, we must attend the knowledge therof by the euents which time shal discover, and not trouble our felues to seeke out the springs of Nilus. A father how great & powreful soeuer, cannot thinke too soone nor to often, to breed vp the youth of his child in vertue, nor to assure his fortune: I say a child without distinction, for although the Law doth distinguish Bastards from them that are lawfully begotten, yet nature makes no difference. The King hauing determined to make Alexander Monsieur (his Bastard Son,) of the order of the Knights of Malta, resolved to do it in time, that he might receiue the name & the effect. The great Master reputing it an honor to haue a Prince of their Company issued from so valiant and courageous a race

1604. A race, sent all necessarie expeditions. The King hauing receiued them, would haue A the execution to be accompanied with a sumptuous and stately ceremonie. He caused the great Commander of France and that of Champaigne to come to Paris, and commanded them to call the greatest number of Commanders and Knights they could thither. The King had cholen the Augustines Church for this effect, but the Commander of Ville-Dieu (being Ambassador of their Order) beseeched him that it might be in that of their Temple, as one of the cheefe houses of the Order. On the Sunday morning the King and the Queene went in one Carosse, hauing Alexander Monsieur Priors, twelve Commanders and sixteene Knights, who was deliuered by the King vnto the Grand-Prior, who attended him at the first gate with all the Commanders and Knights. As the Church was hung with the richest Tapestry that could bee found, so was it filled with that which B was of greatest worth in Paris. The Princes, the Princesses, the Cardinall of Gondy, the Popes Nuncio, many Bishops, the Ambassadors of Spain and Venice, the Constable, the Chancellor, the seuen Presidents of the Parliament, and the Knights of the order of the holy Ghost. The Ceremonie began by the blessing of the sword, and by the change of his habits, to let the Knight vnderstand that hee did bind himselfe to change his life, and to take vpon him the true ornaments of vertue, without the which all the pompe and felicitie of the world is but wind and vanitie, for being attyred in white tatten, layed thicke with gold lace, the sleeves whereof were garnished with rich Me-dailles, a Carkanet of stones crosse vnder his arme, a blacke veluet Cappe with a little white feather, and a band couered with great pearls, he put on a roabe of blacke taffeta, and was conducted neere vnto the great Altar, being accompanied by the Duke and Duchesse of Vendosme, and followed by the Commander for the conduct of this Ceremonie. Saincte Foy Bishop of Neuers made him a little admonition, of the great-nes and excellencie of the order whereinto he entred. It is the first of Christendome, as that of the Germanes is the second. Of Calistrus, the third. Of S. Iaqués in Spain, the 4. Of Saint Marie de la Mercede in Arragon the fift. Of Iesus Christ in Portugall, the sixth. Of Saint Lazare and Saint Maurice in Sauoy the 7. Of Saint Stephen in Tofcare the eight. This exhortation ended, the Masse began, and after the Gospell, Alexander Monsieur presented himselfe vpon his knees before the Grand-Prior of France, with a burning torch of white waxe in his hand, to demand the Order. Hereat D the King (who was set vnder a rich cloth of Estate of Purple veluet imbroydred, in the midst of the quier) left his place, and comming neere to helpe him to answer, he sayd aloud, that he left the ranke of a King to doe the office of a Father. The Grand-Prior gaue him the Order after the accustomed manner, and after Masse was done, as a new Knight he presented himselfe the second time to make profession. The King aduanced againe, and promised for him, that comming to the age of sixteen yeares, he should make the vowes and profession perfect. They be the same vowes which religious men doe make, Obedience, Pouertie, and Chastitie. Hee did his Obedience in the same place, and then being disrobed, the Grand-Prior set vpon his brest, a plastron of blacke tatten, with a great white Crosse, and so the Ceremonie ended with great ioy and founding of Trompeters. The new Knight feasted the Grand-Priors of France and Champaigne, with the Commanders and Knights at the Temple, and the King went to dine with Zamet.

This order hath alwaies affected two kinds of Knights, some for seruice, and others for honor, and both for the greatnes, defence, and support of the Order. There haue beene children of the greatest and mightiest houses of Christendome, who although they doe no seruice in effect, (being dispensed withall) yet they profit their profession much, by the entertainment and communication of friendships and respects of their houses, to the common good of the Order. Others that are issued from the noblest families of all the Nations of the world, are bound vnto actuall seruice in the I-land, they haue all the Mediteranian Sea for the Carire of their exercise, and all the world for witnesses of their glorie. After that they haue done the seruice which they owe vnto the Order, they cannot grow old in pouertie, and in this assurance they goe

A more willingly to all occasions that demand a prooffe of their valour, being reasonable to hazard themselves in great enterprises, to merit great recompences. The season is fayre vnder the newe raigne of the Emperor of the Turkes, who although hee were a childe, and entring into the foureteenth yeare of his age, yet he gaue generous prooffes of his disposition to War, and the Turkes thinke to see spring vp in him the Hatred and Fury of Sultan Soliman against the Christians, and that hee should begin his raigne by the Conquest of Malitha, as the other did by Rhodes. Although he defire of these Barbarians to subdue the Christians be insatiable, yet if they could gette Malitha, they would hold themselves content. There is none but this Morceli that can satisfie them: the Wolfe would be no more a Wolfe if hee were full: but Solim thinking to swallow it once, had like to haue choked, and so may all they doe, that do attempt it. Amet then the newe Emperor of the Turkes, presently after the death of Mahomet his Father, (who ended his life with the end of the last yeare) went to the Mosquee, neere vnto Constantine to put on the Sword of his Fore-fathers. By their example hee should haue put his brother to death, but hee referred him vntill he was of age, to haue children, so as the byrth of the first childe of this Prince, shall bee the ineuitable death of the brother. He let them presently see that his youth should not be incapable of affaires as they thought. Hee caused his Grand-mother to bee tequestred, who would rule, as she had done in the life of Mahomet her Sonne, bee-ing Ambitious, Proud, and Imperious in her passions: hauing great authority, and great Treasure to maintaine it, and to get more: being supported in her desseignes by the worst and most factious of the Empire. He said, that he would go to the Wars of Hungary in person: he made many goodly Orders to reforme the Discipline and to ease the people. He fell sicke of the small pox, and kept his Chamber for some dayes. After his recovery he shewed himselfe often vnto his people. The present hee gaue vnto his Souldiars (as the newe Emperors doe) was of two Millions and a halfe; The Saphis which are the Horsemen, had ten Crownes a man, and five Aspres a day more, to increase their pay, the Janissaries had thirty Crownes, and one As-pre more of pay. The cheefe Officers of the Court did also taste of this liberality. His Father had caused his first Visier to bee strangled. Aly Bascha Gouvernor of great Caire entred into this charge, the Fall and Ruine of the one, was the rising and setting vp of the other.

There is no place so great among the Turkes, as the dignity of the first Visier. Hee alone holds the keynes and Helme of the Empire. He is the first of the Baschas, whose name is a Diminutive of Padachaas, that is to say, Great Emperor. Cyale represented vnto this young Prince, the quality of his deserts, to merite this charge: but hee was answered; That it was referred for Aly Bascha, and that hee should content himselfe with the Admiralty of the Seas. That which did much helpe to raise Aly Baschas fortune, was the treasure which he brought out of Egypt; and the great reputation of Iustice and Witdome that he had gotten in that Prouince, the gouernement whereof is no lesse affected among the Turkes, then it was in former times among the Romaines.
 In his way he had caused a Rebel of some countenance and authority to bee strangled, who had presented himselfe vnto him to haue a pardon. He entred into this charge, & settled the affaires with great order, in the conduct whereof hee left great proofes of his Witdome and Iustice. But he presently left the place vnto another.

The death of Mahomet was not published in the Army of Hungary by any other then by the Generall. Great accidents may not be sodainly deliuered vnto the people, nor without good consideration, for the Inconueniences which the sodaine amazement doth cause. This death did not breake of nor any thing alter the Treaty of a Truce or of a Peace in Hungary. The negotiation was continued in an Island aboue Buda and Pesse, but with small effect. The Emperor distrusting the King of France, barians who haue neither Faith nor Truth. The first enemy that shewed himselfe against Ameth was the King of Persia, who came neere vnto Babilon, giuing the Soul- diars to vnderstand that were within it, that it was onely to deliuer the from the yoke and oppression of the Turkes, to change their condition into a better, and their ser-uitude into Liberty. This made the people of Asia to conceiue some hope of better vltage, vnder the raigne of this young Prince. But euery one desired to change his Maister, vpon a conceit that this change should be profitable, notwithstanding that any alteration in an Estate is mortall: He tooke Tauris (the cheefe City of Persia) and Anziron a strong place in the Mountaynes of the Georgians, and others which remayned to the Turkes by the Treaty of Peace.

This yeare died the Archbishop of Mentz. Wherevpon the Chapter tooke vpon the the Administration of the Archbishopricke, according to the ancient rights, and gaue a day to assemble for the election. Many Noblemen were there present, the Bishop of Wirtzburg came, not vpon an Ass, like vnto the Patriarke of Constantinople, not on foote, as S. Hillary entred into Rome, but on Horsebacke, followed by two hundred Horse. The Prelats of Germany are dispensed of the condition which Christostome desired in a good Bishop, not to ride on Horsebacke, nor allowing Bishops to ride vpon Asses or Moyles, nor to be followed by many seruants. The Election was made in the Cathedrall Church of Mentz, whereas all the people were assembled, not to giue any voyce, but to see the liberty of Suffrages, and the Order and Ceremonie of this action. The Chanoins began it, calling vpon the Holy Ghost to giude their resolutions. The went into the Chapter, and came not forth vntill two of the clocke in the Afternoone, where by plurality of voyces the Election was concluded in fauour of one of the House of Crembourg. The Bishop of Wirtzburg led him before the great Altar, where he was set, wiping away the teares of Ioy, whilst that the Clergy gaue thanks for this Election. This done, the Chapter gaue him a little note in his hand, with the which he went towards the Castle, being followed by the Popes Nun- tio, the Emperors Ambassador, the Bishop of Wirtzburg, and many Noblemen that were there assembled, to honour the election of the first Prelate of Germany. Being come vnto the Castle gate, he founde it shut, and the Gouverneur asked him what he would. As soone as he had seen the note from the Chapter, he did his duty to him, and presently all the Gates were opened, and the Artillery discharged. This forme of Election which is done with Order, Liberty, and knowledge of Merits, is more profitable vnto the Church, then all that which is done by the authoritie of Princes, who many times commit great charges to men vnknowne, and of small merit: or by the tumultuary opinions of people, who haue nothing to do in it. Seeing that our way to retorne into France, is to passe by the territories of the Duke of Lorraine, we shall find all there in teares and mourning, for the death of the Lady Katherine of Bourbon, Duchesse of Bar, and the Kings onely Sister, shee had bene tormented with a continual Feauer, and there were some signes of beeing with child. All the Physitions sayd, shee was not with child, one onely maintayned the contrary, and she beleued his opinion, for that he was of the Religion, neither would she take any thing but from his hands, for that we beleue that easily which we desire. She grewe in choller against them which imputed her distease to any other cause, saying; That they neither desired her contentment nor her Husbands. She thought she could not endure too much to become a Mother. This beleefe that shee had a childe in her body made herto bring forth death, rejecting all kindes of remedies to preserve her frute. If the Physition which had ministred to her as a Woman with childe, had not fled to Metz, and from thence to Sedan, all his Physicke could not haue kept him from death. The profession of Physitions hath this Priuilege; that the Sunne sees their practise, and the Earth hides their faults.

The Duke of Lorraine did her no lesse honour after her death, then he had witnessed it in her life. Hee sent vnto the King an Inuentory of her Jewells. Hee caused the body

A body to be conducted vnto the frontier of France, in a Carosse well appointed, coue-red with blacke Veluet, and drawne with foure Horses. The foure Bailifes of Lorraine carried the foure corners of the Cloth which covered the Coffin: three score Gentlemen marched before with the Gards. The Earle of Chaligny and some Noblemen of the Country went after it. There were twelue Suisses which marched on either side.
 It was receiued vpon the frontier by those whom the King had appointed. The Inhabitants of Troyes would haue receiued it with a Canopy, but Tinteuille thought it not fit, neither would the King haue taken it well. She was much lameted by the Duke of Bar, who could not haue bene Husband to a better Wife, nor she Wife to a better Husband. The fift yeare of their Marriage was with as great respect and loue as the first. The affections of this Prince and this Princeesse, were in such harmony that besides the diuersity of Religion, you would haue sayd they were but one Soule, not in two bodies, but in one called by two names, for they spake with one mouth and thought with one heart. And it there be any content in dying amidst the contents of this world, this Princeesse protested that she had neuer content in this world more perfect then in Lorraine. The Duke of Lorraine and the Duke of Bar desired as well to see her satisfied for doubts of religion. They conitured her in the extremity of her sicknes to thinke of her Soules helth, but she sayd vnto them that she would die as she had liued. She was no more forced in the exercise of her Religion at Nancy then at Nerac.
 True it is that she went to receiue the Communion without the Towne, and had pre-ching and Prayers in her house but for her selfe onely and her followers, without the which shee had bin much honored of the Lorrains, and at that time more then before, the Pope hauing granted a dispensatiō of the marriage. When the newes of her death was brought vnto the King, the chiefe of his Councell came presently to apply some remedy to this wound. He found that they came to that end, & therefore he comanded them to leaue him alone, & that he would resolute with God. He caused the Dores and Windowes of his Cabinet to bee shut, casting him selfe vpon his bed, to weepe more freely, and to ease his greefe in the liberty of his sighes. All the Court did morne, and the Ambassadors presented themselves in that habit vnto the King, to condole this death in the behalfe of their Maisters. The Popes Nuncio was some-what troubled in this complement, & would not mourne at an accident for the which those of his profession could not weepe. The King said that he would not tie him to it against his liking, but he would be glad not to see him, vntill his time of mourning were past. Some other would not haue spoken so mildely, & we knowe that Princes haue showne strange effects of their choller against Ambassadors, that haue failed in the honor and respect of these complements. The Nuncio being better aduised resoluēd to apply himselfe to the time and to do as the rest, thinking that it would not bee taken ill at Rome, knowing that he did it onely to please the King and to haue audience. But he had some difficulty to decipher himself when he was to speake vnto the King, for he could not vnder one habit play two contrary personages, neither had hee words in his mouth nor teares in his eyes for this sorrow. He that will ease an others grieve must shew that he hath a part & feeling thereof. Hee went after an other maner, and his spirit did fit him with an other kinde of complement, the which although it were free, yet was it not vnpleasing. Hee sayd vnto the King that such as knew what he was, and in whose name hee spake, would wonder at the office which he did, but he had more occasion then any other, for that al-lamented the losse of the Body, but his Maister the losse of the Soule. The King sayd vnto him, that hee beleued his Sister was faued, for that in the last gaspe an extreame griefe might carry her right into Heauen, the Nuncio replied. My Lord that discourses is more Metaphisicall then Physicall, and so they both entered into other talke.

The great Duke of Tuscany had an enterprise profitable & glorious for Christendō.
 The Knights of his Order presented unto him often many occasions, which might fill choise of the most difficult & important, in burning of the Turkes gallies at Algier, that he might make all that season fruitlesse and his preparation vnprofitable. The time did 1604 hasten the execution, but the wisdom of the great Duke did iudge, that the stay was more safe then the hazard, & if a Diomedes were fit to do this enterprize, an Ulysses was as necessary to condu& it, Policy & Wisdom being better then Force. An English Captain arriued happily with a Ship laden with Marchandize, for a Marchant of Pisa. The great Duke informes himselfe of him, in what estate the Gallies were in the Port of Algier. He told him that they were eight in number, ready to set sayle in the beginning of Aprill, & to scowre along that coast. The great Duke discovered his desseigne vnto him; the Captaine gaue him some reasons to make this enterprize easie, and the great Duke meanes to execute it. He laded his ship with Salt, vnder the which he had hidden his Fire-works, Powder, & Armes, and to the end that (if the execution succeeded not as he hoped) the King of England should not be offended, he left the English Flag, and tooke that of the Estates of Holland and Zeland. Hee entred the Port of Algier, making a shew that he would vnlade his Salt; Where finding two other English Vessells, he discovered his desseigne vnto the Captaine, offering them part of the Honour and Profit of the execution, if they would hazard themselves in the same danger. They agree, and prepare for it happilie, taking such good opportunity to cast the fire, as if the great Duke had bin as well serued by them which made the artificiall fires, as by them which cast the, the Turke had saued nothing of his Gallies but the ashes, which the Winde had left vpon the Port, and the spoyle of this Pyrat had beene preuented.

He had another Enterprize against the Turke, where in he was not hindred but by the Infidelity of those to whom he had giuen the Word & Faith of a Prince to dwell safely in his Estates. The Jewes which liue at Lisorno did discouer it, giuing intelligence thereof so soone, as the Mariners (which came from the Leuant and past by the Port) said, that they attended the great Dukes Gallies in Negrepont. The great Duke did but laugh at it. There be the effects of Fidelity and Affection which Princes may expect in nourishing those Serpents in their bosomes. The Jewes bee the Turkes best spies, who knowes that they are made against Christians with an implacable furye. Curst Dogges are kept tyed all day, and let loose at night. But these People should be straitly garded at all times. And in all places, they should be still kept in seruitude, as their rebellion against the Truth hath deserued.

The King of Spainne is offended that the French go to serue Prince Maurice, to hinder his brother the Archduke in the taking of Offend: That he lends them money, & that he prohibits his Subjects to trafficke into Spainne and Flanders. The King saies, that he hath not therby any cause to complaine. For the first, he doth not aduow them that go to serue the States. For the second he restores that which they haue lent him, & paises in small summes the grosse which he had receiued in his necessity. But the King hath two great occasions to be offended with the King of Spainne. The one was that he refused to reuoke the imposition of 30. in the 100. which he hath set vpon all Marchandize that goes in or comes out of Spainne. Vpon this refusal he was coucilled to forbid the French to Trafficke into Spainne or Flanders. The Marchants of the Towns of Traffike, made great sute to haue it taken awaye, and deliuered in reason that deserued consideration, if the King had not had others of greater importance, the which made him to continue constant, although he in his own priuate receiued more prejudice then any other, by the great diminution of his Customes. But he respected not this losse in regard of a greater good, hauing found that the continuance of the Traffike which the French made into Spainne & into the Archdukes Countries, would be more ruinous then profitable vnto the, for the great and insupportable impositions which they lay vpon the Marchandize that went in or out off their Estates. The King of Spainne should haue pleased many, if hee would haue made shewe of this discontent vpon this Interdiction. But he had other thoughts. And hauing had some speech with the Ambassador of the King of Cusco at Valence, many beleued that he would againe attempt Algier, for that he caused him to be conducted by a Master of the Campe & an Ingener, with great store of munition and wilde fire laden in three Frigats.

This Inhibition did nothing alter the Peace of Veruins, as they desired which cannot carry their Hands but vpon the pomells of their Swordes, their Feet but vpon a breach

A breath and their eyes, but vpon a place of Battaille, but a wise Prince doth neuer vnderstand any Warre lightly, considering that the time of frindship is more sweete then that of reuenge. The other cause of offence was that hee did withdrawe the Kings Subjects from their faith and loyalties, and that he alwaies entertained some Traitors in France. Desbarreaux the Kings Ambassador in Spainne complained often by his letters, that he was ill informed of the affaires, and so late as the King of Spainnes ministers vnderstood the before him. The King was much troubled to discover this treachery, which came to a place that was without all suspicion. Villeroi had a yong man in his seruice, in whom he trusted, for that he must of force trust some one, and this confidence tried by many yeares seemed to be the more certaine, for that he was Son to a Father who neuer had other Maister nor better Fortune. He gaue him vnto Rocheport going to remaine Ambassador in Spainne, to serue him for a Secretary, and in a small time he grew so capable both of the Language and Maners of the Spaniards, as he did write, speake & treat like vnto a naturall Spaniard. He was some-what discontented with his Master, & to vrona disphight hee resolved to betray him, discovering his intention to a French-man called Raffis, who was retired into Spainne for some crime that was not pardoned nor abolished by the Edict of Peace. He presents himself vnto one of the King of Spaines Secretaries, and offers his Honor and his Conscience to his seruice. Hee made no great esteeme thereof, thinking it to bee but the wandring liberty and fantasies of a yong man, & the first motion of his defection a heat of youth, a fire of straw for some discontent.

B Hee made no great esteeme thereof, thinking it to bee but the wandring liberty and fantasies of a yong man, & the first motion of his defection a heat of youth, a fire of straw for some discontent. A French inconstancy fit to receiue all sorts of formes and changes, & in a word, a bad Seruant for a good Maister. Hee sayd vnto him that the King of Spainne resolved not to studie any more in the Bookes of an others heart, hauing so good Intelligence with the King of France, as he desired not to vnderstand his affaires by any other Instrument then his Ambassadors. This answer which did not satisfie his opinion, made him not to change his resolution. He adrest himselfe vnto an other who was one of the chiefe of the King of Spaines Councell, who considering howe much it doth import a Prince to knowe his Neighbors secrets, and that hee could not giue to much for a good Intelligence, a faithfull Spie, and a confident Traitor (which they must seeke out by all means) hee gaue eare to this yong man, and iudging that a Traitor may be made of any mettall and that in the like occurrents they must tast and heare all, he gaue him good entertainment, incouraging him to continue in his resolution, making him great promises in recompence of his treacheries. He sent him backe to him to whom he had first discovered himself, assuring him that he should giue him satisfaction. He returned to the first, who being aduised by the second, that the neglect of such an occasion did wrong the Kings seruice and the duty of his charge, he considered more exactly of his offer, assuring him that hee did willingly imbrace it, & that his seruice should bee respected, by the King of Spainne. He makes him to speake with the Duke of Lerma, whom (for the first prooue of his deuotion, and of that which he could do) he did acquaint with the Kings letters sent to the Ambassador his Master. Here the bargain was concluded, & the Treason framed and fauored with a present of twelue hundred Crownes, & an assurance of the like yearly pension, & more according to his seruice. Rocheport finishing not the time of his Ambassage, the miserable wretch was out of hope to enioy a detour that which was promised, if he did not continue to giue the intelligence.

1604. Kings Ambassadors and Agents that reside with Princes and Potentates, both within A and without Christendome, being alwaies in Cipher, they are left to such as haue the couer-Cipher to decipher, relying vpon their fidelities. This yong man being returned to his first condition, but not to his first dutie, continued to giue intelligence to the Ambassador of Spaine, of that which hee did see & learne by the dispatches which he did cipher and decipher, and to aduance the King of Spaine seruice, he hindered the Kings, giuing Taxis the Spanish Ambassador, and after his departure, Saniga his succesor in that charge, meanes to dispatch their Posts with such aduantage, as the King of Spaine was still aduertised before the Ambassador of France, whereof he complained.
He discovered it more plainly vpon this occasion. The King had written a letter to his Ambassador to acquaint the Popes Nuncio with a part thereof, and to keep the rest secret. Hauing receiued it, he commanded one of his seruants to shew the Kings letter vnto the Nuncio, vnto a certaine place & to conceale the rest. He goes vnto the Popes Nuncio, who had bene already informed of the busines, by one of the King of Spaine Secretaries. He red the letter, and past not the place which the Ambassador had markt.
The Nuncio seeing that he stayd there, told him that he knew the rest, & that the King of Spaine Secretarie had acquainted him therewith. This being reported to the Ambassador, he knew well that he was sold, and the King betrayed. Hee could not but aduertise the King thereof. Rffis taking this occasion for the furest meanes to worke his peace, goes vnto the Ambassador, & tels him that he had meanes to discover a Tray-tor vnto the King, who reuealed his secrets. The Ambassador gaue him letters, and C assured him of what he desired for his pardon, and of a greater recompence. He takes post to returne into France, the King of Spaine ministers were presently aduertised of his departure, they speedely dispatch a Courrier to the Ambassador, to assure him that there was one gone out of Spaine, by whose meanes the King might discover the treacheries of Leslé, commanding him to do what he could to saue him, and to charme him to silence, that being taken he might not reueale that which could not be known nor discovered but by his owne mouth. The Ambassador giues him notice thereof 2. houres before the King was aduertised, telling him that hee was vndone if he did not flee. It is easie to perswade a miserable man to flee, who feares the paine of his wickednes, and cannot endure the testimonie of his conscience. Hee fled, but the euasion D of the bodie was his ruine, and to saue his head, he lost both body & soule. for the King hauing sent diuers Pursuits to pursue him, & hauing bin ouertaken by him of Meunx, at Fay, neere vnto La Ferte vnder Iouarre, vpon the way to Lorraine, the which he took to get out of the Realme, he cast himselfe into the river of Marne, and so was drowned.
A iust reward for such a treachery. A miserable dispaire for him, but happie for those who had lost the hope of their safety if he had had time to discover their practises. The King was forrie that he was not taken alive, from whome he might haue drawne some light for the good of his seruice. But his master was so extremely greued, that he wished a more exemplary Iustice for so great a disloyaltie, and a more perfect knowledge of the effects, and of the complices of this treacherie. Doubtles this was a great affliction vnto him, the which he did not dissemble in his letters written to his friends, thanking the Gouernor of Lions, for that hee had kept good gard, least this wretch should passe through his gouernment: he sayd that hee was much greued, that this disloyal Traytor, who had betrayed his King, his Country and his Master, had wilfully drowned himselfe, for he deserved a more seuerer and shamelull end, in regard of the Kings seruice and his own particular. The bodie of this wretch (who had sold himselfe vnto the Spaniards) was drawne in peeces by foure horses. The punishment was without any feeling for him, but it did torment the wicked with a shamelull feare, and did trouble the good with a pittiles horror.

Soone after the King discovered a new practise against his seruice and the Daulphins. F The winds are inuisible, but they that blow them to gather these clouds together were well knowne, and from what coast they came. They were but sparkes of fire, as soone quencht as kindled. The King did write vnto some of his cheefe and principall seruants

from me by letter, for it is a signe that all is well God be thanked, as well for my person as for my affaires. The Spaniards would willingly haue more matter & oftener, for they cannot desist from their ordinary practises to corrupt my seruants. I haue of late discouered some newe desseigne, in the which my Nephewe the Count of Auvergne and Seigneur of Entragues are named, the which they haue willingly aduowed and confessed. But I haue taken so good an order as no inconuenience shall happen.

The ninth of Iune the Pope created eightene Cardinals, not according to the passion of great Princes that had intreated him, nor to the liking of his kinsmen, knowing that his Predecessors had conferred those dignities vpon vnworthy persons, (set B Scarlet hats vpon heads without vnderstanding, and giuen Pasquin occasion to complaine, that some approached neere vnto Saint Peters chaire that were more stoanes, and had lesse braines then hee had: The King had recommended many great Prelats of France to bee remembered at the first promotion, to supply their places that were dead. Among them that were newly created, there were two French and two Spaniards.
The Spanish Ambassador made great instance to haue more, and not to haue his Master equalled by the King of France. The first in the list was Seraphin Olinari Patriark of Alexandria, by race an Italian but borne at Lions, one of the most Iudicious Prelats of his age. Only vertue aduanced him to this dignity, and the King made great instance for him by Bethunes his Ambassador. Leames Dany Bishop of Eureux receiued the like Honor by the Kings recommendations. His seruices in reconciling the King with the C Pope, his Lerner writings and his knowledge in Diuinity, did worthily purchase him this Honour. The rest were all Italians except Bernard Matzeiouischi Bishop of Cra-couia a Polonian. Cardinal Aldobrandin did also aduance Herminio his Secretary to this Honour, of whome there is so much spoken in the discourse of the Warres of Sauoy.
Anselme Marzat a Capuchin of Monopoli was forcibly drawne into the number by the Popes expresse commandement, hauing once refused this dignity, and protesting with teares of the iniury that was done vnto Saint Francis and the strict-rules of his Order. Of all the eightene that were made Cardinals, their was not any but this Capuchin but did affect it, and many others that did expect it were disapointed. There D was some feare least the Controuersie betwixt the Count of Fuertes and the Grisons should drawe a ciuill Warre into Italie, vnder the pretext of Religion. The reason of this trouble grewe, for that he would force the Grisons to breake the alliance they had made the last yeare with the Venetians, and to make that which they had with France fruitlesse. The King aduertised of these practises, commanded de Vie his Ambassador to goe vnto Coire, and to represent vnto that people the wrong they should doe vnto their reputations in forsaking the faith and obseruation of their Treaties. Out of the discours which de Vie did vse vnto them, to perswade them to the keeping of their word, these points were collected of the inuiolable firmenesse of their word and oth.

There must be many acts of vertue to purchase and maintayne a great and good reputation, one onely action to the contrary doth ouerthrow it, and smotheres the remembrance thereof. It is gotten by many commendable and vertuous actions, but that which proceeds from Constancy and Generosity in the obseruation of promises, is so much the more commendable, for that it is grounded vpon Faith and Religion which bee the two pillars that do assure and maintayne Estates.

The Ancients haue sayd that Faith was the foundation of Iustice, the Honour of Heauen and Earth, without the which the World could not continue in Peace, and they erected her Altar neere vnto that of thundring Iupiter, to shewe that God is the reuerger of the breach of Faith. And Religion is so proper to Man and to the society of Men, that as Man cannot be Man without it, so there is no Nation howe barbarous soeuer, that liues without some shadowe of Religion. As they haue the best part of essence and the solemnity of Alliances and Confederations, in the which God is called on as a witnesse and Iudge of their Intentions that doe promise and binde themselves; so is hee greatly wronged in the breach of promises. And there-

Religion one of the pillars of a State.

1604. fore the commendations that are giuen to many Nations are held vaine and ridiculous being separated from this constant and immutable affecton of keeping their faith. As the Greekes haue beene commended for many actions of Valour and Vertue, the which notwithstanding vanish away shamefully, in the reproch which hath alwayes bene made vnto them, to deny their words easily, and neuer to binde themselves, but with an intent not to hold. And contrariwise the memory of the Faith and Constancy of the Romains is immortall, who abhorred the breach of promises, and held it an inexpressible Crime to violate Treaties. It is not Armes alone, but the constancy of Religion and their faith giuen, that had raised them to so great a power, as they held in their hands the Reynes of all the Prouinces of the habitable Earth. In the beginning, the neighbour people did not esteeme them as a City, but rather a campe of Theeues, a nest of Tyranny, and a Cittadell in the midst of them, to trouble and practise all the furies of their Ambition. But when as they vnderstood that Faith only and a simple oath (all feare of punishment layde aside) did gouerne the City, they grewe to such Reuerence and Respect, as they held it a greater happines, to obey a people so generous in their actions, so constant in their Words, and so religious in their oaths, then to command ouer others. The formes of the Common weale of the Grifons haue great conformities with the politike and military Lawes of the Romains: and as it yeelds nothing vnto them in Valour and Generosity, so hath it alwayes preferred (like vnto them) the Religion of their Word and Promise, holding publike Faith the Foundation and Ground-woke of Estates, as Treachery is the Plague and Ruine thereof. This sufficeth to shew howe odious the Perswasions or rather Practises and Inchauntments of those should bee, that counsell them to reuoke the Alliance made and sworne with the Common-weale of Venice.

The estate of ancient Rome.

Which be
cells.

Wee must cherish and respect the Councells and Remedies of such as loue the sicke Patient, but we must suspect all things that come from the hand of a Neighbour that is an enemy, they minister nothing how sweete soeuer, which causeth not great Motions and Alterations in the Bodye. His Honey is worse then that of Cholches, which did not infect the Heart, nor trouble the Vnderstanding but for a day. In the distinction and choise of aduice, wee must preferre those that preferre Honour and augment Posterity, before those that dissolve the Concord and Quiet of an estate. Those (sayd a great Orator to the Atheniens) are to be credited that Counsell to entertaine Alliances with friends, for there is nothing more befitting a free City then the care and loue of Equity and Iustice. Those that by their pollicies and roughnesse, would separate the Grifons from the Alliance of their friends, haue happily some desseignes vpon their liberty, the which they cannot execute better then by cutting off the number of their friens, the which can neuer bee too great howe great and mighty soeuer he be. And if they haue not this desseigne, yet their Councell is alwayes vnjust, seeing the effect concerns the shame and ignominy of this Nation, which cannot go from the truth of their promises, vnlesse they wil be generally taxed for treachery and basenesse. A reproch so much the more to bee feared, being certaine that as soone as a Common-weale hath giuen any subiect to doubt of her Faith, shee must inuent newe formes of Religion to purchase credit with other Estates, and vknowne people, to trust vnto their promises: for such as knowe the deceiuers will auoyde the deceit. And although among the corruptions of our age faying and dissembling be esteemed vertues, & haue in the opiniõ of the vulgar notable qualities, yet among those that haue conteyned themselves within the boundes of ancient Integrity, and knowe not the pollicies and deceits of the new-come. The people that are defamed for treachery and disloyaltie loose all their friends.

And in the end this Alliance hath bin sworne by the most sollempne acts of Religion. The name of the lyuing God (who should not be taken in vaine, and is polluted by the lightnesse of an oath) hath bene called vpon. It is an extreame Impiety, to make that Soueraigne Spirit, that Infinite Immutable and Incomprehensible Essence, who

A who is all Iustice and all Trueth, a witnesse of our basenesse and lying, that the Honnestie of his name should couer our Dissembling, his Iustice our Wrong, his Trueth our Deceit, and approue that which naturall Reason cannot allowe of. And this bond of Faith giuen, is of such necessity, as it must be kept euen with Enemies, whereof that great Capitaine Iosua hath left a memorable example, refusing to breake the Treaty which hee had made with the Gabionites, Pagan Infidells; Although hee had discovered their deceite, and was intreated by the chiefe of the Army to loose their Alliance. The answer he gaue them was grounded vpon Reason, saying; That they had giuen them their Faith, and that they must feare least the furie of God (by whose Name they had sworne) should come vpon them.

B There was great difficultie to retayne these people inclining to change, vpon the huge promises made them by the Count of Fuentes. They could not resolve in their Councells. The weight of will and hope carried them away. Hee would reduce them to extreame necessity, taking from them the Commerce of Milan, without the which, they could not liue. The Grifons Estate is merely popular, consisting of fixe and twenty Comunalties, the which are diuided into three Cantons. It is a difficultie to finde any thing equall, constant, or well aduised among so many Heads, bredde vp in the Maximes of a Democratic. The Count of Fuentes had debauched foure; who had like to haue corrupted the rest, as a little Leuaine marres a great lump of Dowe. For they stucke onely vpon Money, which the one demanded and the other offered. He gaue so good entertainment to the Ambassadors that came to him to Milan, as they passed so many Articles as he pleased, applying themselves to his humour of Peace, which being dishonorable is of worse condition for Free men then Warre it selfe. But when at their returne they would haue drawne the people to allowe thereof, the Ambassador of France arrived so happily as hee let them vnderstand the preiudice and wrong that they did vnto themselves. So as the best aduised being informed of this surprize, resolved not to stray from the obseruation of the Alliances of France and Venice, nor to depend for their passages, vpon the aduice and command of the Count of Fuentes nor of his successors, as he had bound them by his Articles, presuming that he could defend with

The great promises of the Count of Fuentes to the Grifons.

C Sword, that which hee had gotten with Gold. True it is that they made offer to enter into a new Capitulation of all that might be without preiudice to their Alliances, to assure a good Neighbourhood with the State of Milan, so as the Count of Fuentes would demolish the Fort within fixe months vpon their Frontier. The great Cantons of the Suisses were Actors in this busines, perswading the Grifons to trust rather to Courage then to the safety of their mountaines. Matters continued in great suspense. They sent often to A Milan, and what was concluded there was dissolved in the Assembly of the People, by the friends of this Crowne, and by the Wisdom of the Kings Ambassador, who said plainly that his Maiesty would leaue their Alliance, if they made not a Declaration that might content him. Those iudgments that were found & not preiudicate, found it reasonable, & in this reason the honor of their faith & the reputation of their estate, as contrariwise they thought it could not be an act of glory to sel their Alliance, as it was not comendable for the Spaniards to buye it, if they were, of the Romans humor, who neuer fought that by Gold, which they might do by the sword. But against these apparent reasons, the Count of Fuentes had so many Trickes and Deuises, as the Ambassador of France had much adoe to retayne this people, who promised in words not to forsake the allyance of France and Venice, doing the contrarye in effect. In former times it was incredible that the Suisse so great an enemy to the house of Austria, from whose subiection they had revolted, and the Grifons so contrary to the Spanish fashions, would incline that way, and contradict the very feeling Resolution of the Grifons.

F of Reason and Nature: The Truth hath freed the doubt, and let vs see that it is of this people as of Viniger, the which neuer freezeth for that it is extremely cold. The Suisses and Grifons for that they are enemies to the Spaniards will not haue the power of Spain to bee their enemy.

An Alliance purchased dishonorable.

1604. The bad successe of this businesse did not concerne France and the Venetians alone, the best aduised did fore-see that it might drawe a Ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. Many Commanders and Captaines Grisons, not able to endure the Rigour and Threats of the Count Fuentes, were solicited by them of their Beleefe and Religion (lurking in Italy) to hold good, and to attend vntill the Lord came from Edom to disperse their enemies, and to beleue that as there is no War more glorious then that which is vndertaken to free their Country from seruitude, so there is none more iust then that which is made to deliuer Consciences from Tyranny, and that both in the one and the other occasion it is a great happynesse to sacrifice their Liues. The King sent aduice thereof to Rome for the Consequence and Danger of Religion. Hee did also pacifie the diuision of the people of Valais, who were in Armes and ready to come to a generall Combate for the same quarell. In the meane time the Grisons remayned betwixt the doubtfullnesse of Warre, and the discommodities of Peace, and as in the breeding of such diuisions, free and curious spirits cannot reteyne their passions, they made Pasquins in Italy vpon this subiect, and the Spanish braueries were not mute, the which the Grisons answered with the like humour. If the Venetians who were the cause of all the mischeefe, would haue spoke and set their hand to the worke as they ought, the Count of Fuentes (who did more by example then by any authority) would haue intreated the Grisons more mildly. But besides that Common-weales are not good for an offensive Warre, these Seigneurs who would not hazard anything, but preferre present and assured things before that which was past and perilous, would haue beene content to haue inioyed that which they desired without any trouble.

There was a generall assembly held at Milant, at one of the Corners of the Grisons, where after great diuersity of opinions, it was concluded by the greater part, that (seeing the Ambassadors had through their Avarice defamed their Legation, and suffered the Count of Fuentes to binde the liberty of their aduice with chaines of Gold, and had exceeded the instructions that were giuen them) the last Treaty made at Milan should be declared voyde, and of none effect, if the Alliance of France and that of Venice were not expressly referred. The Dobsles of Spaine, had wrought wonders, giuing motion to the most heauy, and speech vnto the Domsbe, to fauor the Count of Fuentes intentions, with a Nation that loues money beyond all measure. But in the ende the consideration of their owne health, and the ruines of their liberty were of more force, making them to chooseth the hazard of Armes, and of all discommodities, rather then to suffer the Fort which the Count of Fuentes had caused to be built, to stand vnruiued. And for that (incensed with this resolution) he had made shew to seyye vpon Valteline, they made a leauy of eighteene hundred Men in fixe companies to oppose against him.

The Kings intention was, that the treaty of Milan should not alter the Alliances of the Crowne of France and of Venice. But if the Grisons should breake with the French, & dishonour their reputation with so foule a defection, the French had no great reason to regard it, seeing it were a losse but of inconstant friends, whose faith was ruined by the same meanes it was preserved. True it is they should loose a goodly passage into Italy, but when they had any desire to goe thither, it should not bee by the Grisons. The French Armies were neuer led that way to passe the Alpes. It is true that when the Kings of France held Milan, this passage was necessary for them to draw in Suisses and Germaines, for their seruice. But inioying this no more, they neede not to care much to loose that which cost them so deere to maintaine. This was the beginning of the thirteenth yeare of Pope Clement the eighth sitting in the Pontificall Chaire. In his youth a Mathematician told him, that he should be a Cardinall then Pope, and should sit in the seat twelue yeares. A Friar had told Leo the tenth as much (hauing saued himselfe in Mantoua after the battell of Rauenna) assuring him that hee should be Pope, before he came to the age of fortie yeares. A Terme which made this prediction seeme ridiculous and impossible, and yet it was true, for after the death

A death of Julio the second the yong Cardinalls being banded against the old, chooseth him Pope. The Astrologian, hath spoken very truly in the two first aduencures of this Pope, but hee hath misreckned himselfe in the third, yet some feare it is but one yeare, for this which wee shall shortly beginne is full of badde constellations vpon that Sea, as they hold that haue studied the booke of the Abbot Isachim. About that time there was a Iesuite that maintained an opinion that was held very bold throughout all the Catholike Church, but most dangerous at Rome. That it was no point of the essence of Faith to beleue that Clement the eighth was the true and lawefull succesor of Saint Peter. He was committed to prison, and if the Ambassador of Spaine had not delt in it, hee had sped worse, and tried that the Bodie hath often reason to complaine of the paine which the Spirit causeth. An other Iesuite propounded a proposition which was held very strange for the Nouelty and the Consequence thereof. Which was. That Confession might be done by Letters and by Postes. These with some other questions were decided before the Pope and the Cardinalls in the following yeare.

questions.

There fell out halfe a sedition in Rome by the meanes of Cardinall Ferneze. One being pursued by the Officers to be carried to prison, fled into the Cardinalls Pallace as into a Sanctuary, where he found a backe doore to escape. This flight was fauored by the incounter of some of the Cardinalls Gentlemen, who walking in the Court and seeing the Sargents make a noise at his escape whom they thought to apprehend, they gaue them badde words with some threats, for the small respect they had borne vnto their Masters house. The Pope was aduertised thereof, and the Governor of Rome went thether with his Officers. The Cardinall Ferneze beleened that all the Consistory was offended at this affront, the which troubled all Rome. They had giuen the Pope to vnderstand that this did concerne the authority of his Iustice, without the which the City could not continue happy. They had layed open this boldnesse vnto him by many considerations of his owne private interest. They sayd that this did but increase the discontents which many had conceiued against the house of Aldobrandin. The tumult grewe so great, as one sword drawne had put all the City in Armes. The Ambassador of Spaine came to the Cardinalls Pallace with all his friends, and there spent the whole night, looking on the Romaine gentlemen that played in the Hall: and a king who had wonne or lost, they told him that the Duke Gaelan had lost six hundred Crownes: Seigneur Duke (sayd hee in Spanish) assure your selfe that you loose nothing this night for the notable seruice you do vnto the King. Hee was often herd to say these words, the which were fuller of vanity, then of necessity or reason, A qui quiero morir, as if the Pope who had no forces would come to beseege him.

The next day the Cardinall Ferneze retired himselfe to a house of his called Capra-rola siue & twenty miles from Rome, whether he was accompanied with the principall men in Rome: The Pope sent the Governor vnto him, to receiue his gouernment from him, as if hee had lost it for that he had entred into his Pallace with his Sargents. He quenched the heat of those fiery Spirits with his teares, and complained that they did not loue him as he did loue, and that therein the intention of true friendship was deceived. But hee commanded his Nuncio in Spaine to copiaine of the King of Spains Ambassador, who had openly discovered his passion against him. In the end the Duke of Perma brought back the Cardinall to Rome, & al was pacified. As he came frō Monte-cassallo where the Pope was, he was well accompanied & followed into the Court of his Pallace, with cries of ioye. Viva la Casa Ferneza. These were the peoples violent passions not so much for any loue of him, as in hatred of the Cardinall Aldobrandin. But none of them trusted to this reconciliacion. The Cardinall, the Duke Gaelan, and many others of the greatest of the City went out of Rome. The Pope caused fixe hundred Corses to come, and two hundred Harguebuziers on Horse-backe for the gard of Saint Peters Bourg, and if hee had had the Spirit of Sixtus the fifth, or of Popes that were Predecessors to Paul the third, this small beginning had beene the cause of great accidents.

1604. and Consistory, the great occasions that were lost in Hungary for want of means to attempt and execute them. for although the Bascha were arrived with two millions of Gold, they found that this Army was more capable to consume this provision, then to doe any great effect, and that they would onely seeke to waite and spoyle. The Pope told him that he had no money, and that he should be constrained to impose a tenth upon the Clergy of Italy to that effect. The Emperors Ambassador wondred, that the Pope said he had no money, for euery man knoweth what his Treasure is, in the Castle S. Angelo. It is not toucht but is wholly reserved for the necessities of Rome. The Emperour did also command his Ambassador to go to the Princes of Italy, and to intreat the like succors from them, but it was without effect. Hee was angry that the Duke of Sanoy (Vicar of the Empire) did refuse to contribute to the charges of this Warre. Hee was not in so good termes with the Venetians, as to hope for any secret succors of money. The controuersie grew for the confines of the Earle of Tyrol, for the Venetians complained, that they had vsurped vpon certaine Mountaines of the Alpes vpon the passage of Trent, for the recouery and maintynance of their Iurisdiction, they made some courses through the Mountaines with their Souldiers to make reprisalls of Men and Cattell, and doing other acts of possession. The Emperour was not so much troubled for this vsurpation, as he was extremely grieved for the loss of Pesla, the which happened through want of Courage, vnworthy the Glory and Reputation of Christians, for there are sinister accidents in Warre, which may rather be imputed to the rigor of Fortune, and to want of foresight then to cowardise, but this yeelding of the place was more basenesse. Those of Buda hauing received a great Conuoy or some newes thereof, shot off all their Artillery, and made great shouts of Ioy after their manner, the Christians thinking it was some great assault or some furious charge that would be giuen them, were so amazed, as they forsooke the Towne without the sight of any enemy.

Pesla abandoned by the Christians.

The King of Persia and Ambassador to the Emperour.

Description of Persia.

But as Christian Princes were cold in so holy and iust a Warre, God makes vse of an Infidell Prince, to their owne confusion. The Persians had bene long oppressed by the Turkes, but nowe it seemes they can and will seeke their reuenge. If a part of the Turkes Forces were kept occupied in Hungary, they would easily preuaile ouer the rest, and force the Turkes to giue them Water and Earth in signe of their subiection. For this occasion the King of Persia, sent an Ambassador to the Emperour to intreat him not to make any Peace with Amst, assuring him to succour him with many thousandes of Men and Crownes. Hee paid by Lions and did see the Governour to whom he reported wonders of the greatneesse and power of the King of Persia, who he said had taken aboute foure score Towns from the Turke, that he had defeated Cigale in Battell, and that now he held Aleppo besieged, and that they could not passe his Countreies in three moneths, that he could raise two hundred thousand Foote, and a hundred thousand Horse for his defence. After that hee had discoursed long with him vpon this subiect, he asked the Governour by his Interpreter, What profit he had by his charge, and the Governour asked Why he demanded it? Because (answered the Ambassadour) that the King of Persia my Maister neuer reapes any profit of that which is leauied in his Provinces, but leaues the disposition thereof to the Governours, who for that respect are bound in time of War to furnish a certaine number of Men and a propotion of Money out of the revenues of their Governments. Xc must beleue them which come from far, for that the great distance makes the prooffe difficult. The Persian ioynes vpon the North with the Medes, on the West side it hath Susiane, vpon the East Caramania, and towards the South, it is bounded with the Sea. The powers of the World haue their revolutions and periods as well as Men. It hath bene seene in the Monarchy of the Persians. They held the Monarchie two hundred and fife and twenty yeares, the Medes expelled the, these were chased away by the Macedonians, and they by the Romaines, and the Romaines by the Saracins. Since they haue freed themselves from any others command, and reserved some peece of the ancient Monarchy. But the Turkes intreated them very ill, who after many long Wars granted them in the end so infamous a Peace, as they retained

A retained their capitall Cittie, and so iniurious, as the worst conditions of warre had bin better. As peace is to be desired for them that are at ease, and war for the miserable. This Persian tooke the way of Suiffeland to performe his Ambassage, hee went from Lions to Baden, during the assemblie of the thirteene Cantons of Suiffes, he had but one more on horsebacke with him, and fife or sixe men on foot, and one cart for his baggage. When as the Kings Ambassador saw him in his equipage he said, he did not thinke his charge should haue any great traine, seeing he himselfe had so small. The King hauing promised to restore the Iesuits. Father Cotton came to Paris by his Maiesties command, with father Armand the Prouinciall, and father Alexander. They not onely found all things easie, but beyond their conceiued hopes: for the King grew presently into such a liking with Father Cotton, as he did nothing but he was called, & in the end his Maiestie granted their returne vpon certaine conditions, and the Edict made for their establishment, (notwithstanding any oppositions made vnto the Court to hinder the confirmation thereof) was confirmed in the beginning of this yeare, and their Colledges restored at Lions, Rouan, Bourges, and Dijon. The Seigneur of Varenne (Controller General of the Posts, and now Governor of the Towne and Castell of Angers, who loued them of this company) besought the King to build a newe Colledge at La Fleche in Aniou, with priuileges like to the other Vniuersities of this realme, the which the King made of a royall foundation, and gaue them his owne house, with pensions, for the instruction of a good number of yong gentlemen, whome his Maiestie would haue bred vp, and instructed there in all Professions, Tongues, & Exercises. During these great royall fauours, Father Cotton tasted of some priuat disgrace, for returning one night somewhat late (about the end of Februarie) and passing by the street of the new bridge, to goe vnto the Louvre, there were certaine Pages and Laquais, which calling for him at the dore of the Carosse, wounded him with their rapiers, hauing one great wound in the shoulder going towards the necke & the throat, whereof notwithstanding he was soone after cured. There was great search made for this attempt, but the King himselfe discovered presently whence it might proceed. The Pages & Laquais of the Court had bene whipt by commandement for their insolencie, in crying with dirision, Old well, old Cotton (vpon the complaint of certain Princes and Noblemen.) Those that say this blow was premeditated by the enemies of the Iesuits, were deceiued, and his Maiesties only opinion (who iudged that it came from the Pages and Laquais) was true. Some were taken and examined, the King himselfe heard the examination, first they excused themselves of the fact, then they sayd that they meant onely to strike the Coachman, to whom they had cryed to goe farther off, and that hee would hurt them, comming so neere the wall, the which hee would not doe, and that thinking to strike the Coachman, they had hurt Father Cotton. If Father Cotton had not bene an earnest suter vnto the King to pardon them, it had gon ill with them, but notwithstanding they were banished the Court, and forbidden euer to come there vpon paine of death. This yeare the King besides his goodly buildings, which shall make his memory commendable to posterity, would also shew vnto future ages, that he had a care of the good of his subiects, who for the commoditie of their commerce & traffick, caused a channell to be made, by the which all merchandise should be carried from the riuer of Loyre into the riuer of Seine. At the same time hee began his channell from Seine to Loyre, which costs a hundred and fourescore thousand Crownes in 3. yeares. They propounded vnto his Maiestie, an enterprize of greater difficultie, to ioyne the two Seas together, & to make the navigation from the one to the other through Frisie, & not to passe by the straight of Gibraltar. By the means of a channell more easie to bee made betwixt the two riuers, which passe the one from Tolouze into the Ocean, & the other from Narbone into the Mediterranian Sea, the which is made to ioyne the riuers of Seine and Loire together. The vnderaker offered Cautio to ioyne the nauigatio of the said two Seas by this Channell, within one yeare for 40000. Crownes only, the which should carrie a vessell of foure sadome wide from one Sea vnto the other, for a certaine prooffe of his dessein. Which was to make ships to passe after aards, within a small time, and for little more charge. There years by strangers, as weauing of gold after the manner of Milan, and the making of cloth and lines of the barke of white Mulberie trees, more easily then of nettles or any other trees, and more strong and of longer continuance then any other, the which was inuented by Menfieur Serres in Prouince. The making of all sorts of Cipres both curld and smooth, and of all other sorts, which were not made before but in Italie, is now established in the Castell of Mantes. Hangings of gilt lether, of all sorts and colours that may be wisht, fairer then Imbrodorie, better cheape, and of greater continuance, for the easinesse and inuention to makethem cleane, and to amend, they are in great shops in Saint Honores, and Saint James suburbs, to set poore people on worke. There were cutting mills inuented, and set vpon the riuer of Eslampes, where they cut iron into many peeces, and into what forme they will, the which was not done before but by the Smithies. The turning of iron, (whereof France abounds) into fine Steele, the which they were forced to seeke in Piedmont, in Germanie, and in other strange Countries, for fise or sixe souls the pound, hauing neuer found any thing in France but iron, the which for the excellencie they call course Steele of Brie or of Saint Desier, the which is sold for two or three souls the pound, at the most. The fournaifes are to bee seene in Saint Victors suburbs, vpon the mouth of the riuer of Bienre, the which deserues to be admired for the excellencie thereof. The making of white Leade, the which is a kind of drogue or quintessence, drawne out of Leade, very necessarie and common for Painters, Farriers, and many others, the which they were forced to seeke and buy deerely out of France, is new made there, better and better cheape. The like inuention there is of pipes of Leade, as long and as big as you will, beaten, and as light as iron for Cuirasses, stronger and more lasting then the ordinarie pipes of Leade, and better cheape, and which make the waters that passe through them more holsome for the bodie of man, by reason of the ingredients of the folding which corrupts the water that passeth by them. Besides the folder doth still leaue some little tongs or drops perced, the which stayes the slime of the water, and makes the pipe to bend, with many other secrets and commodities that depend thereon, inuented by Ferrier, dwelling in the suburbs of Saint Germaine. Some parts of France as well as of Sicilia were this yeare much afflicted for want of D Come. The Dukes of Guise and Vantadour besought the King that hee would be pleased to suffer Prouince and Languedoc to bee supplied by the other Prouinces of his Realme, where there was abundance. The King hauing giuen libertie, there passed great store by the Cittie of Lions, who fearing to fall into the like want, besought the King to reuoake his grant of the passage. The Kings answere seemed to proceed from the heart, not of a Prince onely, but of a Father, who desires to prouide equally for all the necessities of his familie, and hath a care that nothing be wanting. The principall reasons were, that there is nothing more necessarie for the well ordering of an estate, then to entertaine communication betwixt Prouinces to succour one another, and to haue the trafficke as free and as easie as may bee: Nature hauing so framed them, as they haue need one of another, for if the one restraynes the one side, the other may do the like on the other side, so as if one Prouince anioies an other, it may also receiue the like anoyance from them: as if they stoppe the passage of Corne at Lions, they of Languedoc and Prouince, may keepe from them, Oyles, and Spice, and many other necessarie commodities. That the Cittie of Lions hath no interest in this passage, being lawfull for them, to make what prouisions of Corne they please, in Bourgogne, and other places. That hee must also haue care of other Prouinces which haue need of reliefe, whome they might easily perswade that this libertie of passage, depended vpon the fauour and good wil of them of Lions, and not vpon his commandement.

There wanted nothing in France, but permission to trafficke in the King of Spains & F the Archdukes dominions. The sea Townes endured great discommodities, and in the end, if this prohibition had continued, they would haue sayd of the greatest, as was sayd of Megalopolis a great Cittie in circuit of walls, and little in number of Inhabitants.

A habitants. Magna Ciuitas, magna solitudo. A great Cittie, a great wildernes. The Spaniards found this Inhibition much more greuous & insupportable: there was nothing to be heard among them but publike complaints, for that all things grew extremely deare, and the Artisans desperate. This greuance depending vpon the execution of the Treatie of Vernins, the Pope commanded his Nuncio to deale in it. The King would not yeeld to any thing, before that the Spaniards who had troubled the water, did make it cleere againe in reuoking the Imposition of thirtie on the hundred. Therein hee forced his nature, for being so good, as hee desired onely the good of his people, and feesles in his soule that content wherewith God himselfe cannot bee satisfied, hee could not heare speake of this Commerce, if the King of Spaine did not discharge B that Imposi of thirtie for the hundred, which made the libertie of trafficke an extreme seruitude, and the profit an assured losse. This was most seuer and rigorous. There is not any but is bitter to the Marchants, Couetousnes hauing changed the first cause as well as the quantitie of Impositions and Customes. In former times they were not payed, but for the safetie and libertie of the passage from one place to another, and for that Princes haue publike wayes in their protection, which for that reason are called The Kings high wayes, they haue acknowledged this right of protection with some consideration.

In like sort when the Nauigation was vndertaken to the Indies, into Arabia and Ethiopia, the Emperour for the purging of the Sea of Pirats and Routers, imposed the C Gabell or Custome of the red Sea, for the enterayning of shippes of warre against the attempts of Pirats, with the money that should be rayled thereby. Such Impositions for so necessarie occasions cannot bee but iust. Others are not so, and yet they must beare them, being no more lawfull for the subiect to murmur against the Customes, and Imposits, wherewith his Prince doth charge him, then against the Hayle, Rayne, Stormes and Tempests of Heauen. Obedient Children kisse the rodd wherewith they haue beene whipt. Reuenge is reserved vnto God, who forbids the Soueraigne Magistrates to oppresse the people with such charges. Hee let Pharao knowe so much, when as Moses turned his rodd into a Serpent, to let him vnderstand that his Scepter and his raigne was changed into Tiranie and extreme Crueltie. Some D sayd that (Spaine which deliberates long, and resolues constantly) would neuer reuoake this Imposition, for that they would not loose the reputation of the constancie and firmenes of their Lawes, and not to bee taxed of lightnes, applying themselves to the time and occasion. But they must endure it, and the Deputies of the two Kings, and of the Archduke being resolued vpon that point, there was no difficultie but that the Commerce was restored to the first libertie. The Constable of Castille returning into Spaine, came to the King at Fontainebleau. The King sent to receiue him at the entrie of Paris, by the Duke of Monibason, who was well accompanied, and the next day at the entrie of the forest of Fontainebleau, hee found fiftene Carosses full of Gentlemen of the Court, who left E them to offer them to him and to his trayne, and so mounted vpon their horses which did attend them. It cannot bee spoken how royally the King receiued him. Among many testimonies of honour and affection, this was not ordinarie. Zamet inuited him to supper, being readie to washe, the King accompanied onely with Bellegarde and Roguelare enters, saying that hee would suppe with them. The Constable offered him his napkin, and would haue kneeled, the which the King would not suffer, saying vnto him that it was not for him to yeeld honours but to receiue them, for hee was of that house, being allyed to the house of Velasques, to whome the dignitie of the Constable of Castille and Leon is hereditarie, and is an honour in a manner equall with a Soueraigne; the F Emperour Valentinian finding no other place wherewith to honour and aduance his Brother Valence.

there was nothing containd in the Treaty of Veruins but was duly executed, but that which concerned the priuate interest of the Earle of Saint Paul. As for the Generall, it went so well, as it might be sayd the two Kings had neuer had better correspondence, and that their wills although contrary had bene like vnto wine and water which cannot be seperated. As for the affaires of the Realme, the King found to great respect and obedience in all places, as if there remains any passion in the hearts of his Predecessors, they must bee greened that they were neuer so well obeyed. This yeare the States of the vniited Prouinces had prouided an Army of two thousand five hundred sayle great and small, to releene Ostend: if it were possible, or els to attempt Sluse, which is the chiefe port of Flanders, with this resolution the Count Maurice, Landed his Army, tooke the Isle of Casandt, Isandike, and all the forts vpon the maine Land neere vnto the Towne: so as they of Sluse dispayring of releefe seeing the Marquis Spinola repulst from Cassant, made a signe of yeelding, they deliuered vpp the Towne vpon Honorable Conditions, the Capitulation was made the nineteenth of August 1604.

The Arch-dukes forces returned againe to Ostend to presse the besieged whilst the season of the yeare would suffer them, the which was defended with great Constancy and Resolution. The tediousnesse of this siege cost the States more then the entertainment of a great Army, and therefore Count Maurice lent expresse commandement to the Gouernor to Capitulate and leaue that ruine which cost them so many Men and so much Money. Before they entred into Capitulation they sent away their Artillery and all their stufte by Sea. After three yeares siege and more they yeelded vpp the Towne vpon as Honorable conditions, as if they had deliuered vpp the best place in Europe. The Arch-duke entred it, and they that went with him were amazed to see that they had conquered nothing but a Church-yard after so long time and so great expences, and had made an other without that was better peopled. It was a great Glory for the Arch-duke to haue taken this Towne after so longe a patience of three yeares. In matters of Warre they consider not the time that is spent but the successe. Hee lost three yeares time, but the gaine of the thing desired, did recompence his losse.

The Besiegers spent much Powder to haue a heape of Sand, they lost an incredible number of Men to get a Church-yard. It is all one, the victors Glory is not impayred hauing that which hee would haue, there was neuer seene the like For tunc of a Fort nor so great resolution to assaile and defend a Towne without houses, yea without ground, and which promised to the Conqueror nothing but a Barren heape of dust. It seemes that Warre hath made choise of the Lowe Countries, to continue there all this age, as it hath donne the best part of the precedent. Other Prouinces haue bene ruined by Warre, and especially by ciuill Warre, where the Conqueror smites and feelles the losse, but they increase and growe Rich by their Warre. They had not bene so Rich if they had not taken Armes against their Prince, who in the ende will finde it true, that it is dangerous to make long Warre with any people, for that the assiduity and continuance of this exercise makes them warlike, and Capable to vanquish them, who in the beginning durst not encounter his forces. After they haue once put a sword into the Peoples hands, it is hard to wrest it from them. The sword makes the feeble and the stronge equall and can hurt and wounde in any hard. Agessilus being beaten and wounded by them whome hee had forced to take Armes, was mockt by Antaleidas, saying that the Thebans had payed him the hire of it at which hee taught them against their wills. And although the King of Spain and the Arch-dukes powers bee far greater then that of the States, yet they make Warre with greater commodity and safety then he. Among many remarkable considerations of the situation of the Country, they haue the Sea free, by the which they may conduct what numbers and what quantitie of munition and equippage for the Warre they please, and to any place they please, the which cannot

A not bee carried by land but with exceeding great charge and by great marches. So as wee may say of them, as Taxiles sayd of the Romaines that their Armies are inuincible, and we neede not to maruell that they haue so much Artillery, Munition, Carriages and Men, seeing they haue so many Shippes in their ports: And at their doore two great Kingdomes full of warlike Souldiars, which cannot liue in Peace, but Glory in the incounter of dangers, to whome there is no paine that is strange, nor place in accessible, nor enemy redoubtable.

Advantages of the vniited Prouinces for the Warre.

The King of Spain hath great difficulties in this Warre. They say there is no Spanish Souldiar but costes him a hundred Crownes, before he arriues in Flanders. And that those Countries which are of the Ancient Patrimony of the house of Bourgonie haue consumed aboute a hundred Millions of Gold. It is almost forty yeares that it hath continued. Those mountaynes of Gold and Siluer of the Indies haue bene made plaine and almost drawne drie with this Warre. Hee hath bene often constrained to flic to the Genoais purse. His great reuenues haue bene consumed with the incredible charge. The Mines of Siluer of Potosi, discovered with in threescore yeares, which brought vnto the King euery day for his fift part six thousand Pezos euery Peze being valued at thirteene Rials & one forth part, haue not bene sufficient to feede the flames of this Mount Etna. The Marquis of Rhosny, going to take possession of his gouernement of Poitou, was at Rochelle, where hee was receiued with all sorts of Honours, causing his Maiesties intentions to bee enterrayned with so great affection as it did amaze them that knewe that since King Francis the first this Towne had not bene so obedient as the rest. There are secret murmuringes, discontents and distrustes; but they are Cloudes without Water. These are vlters which drawe vnto them badde humours, but the disposition of the Bodie is no whit altered and changed: In shewe all goes well, and wee haue nothing else to care for, for men are commonly satisfied with that which seemes, as well as with that which is. It sufficeth that a Prince bee well obeyed, bee it either for feare or for Loue, France being neuer so miserable as when shee had Kings that cared not to bee well obeyed and I oued.

And what wants a Prince, that is at Peace with in his Realme, admired of Strangers and redoubted of his enemies, who hath so great desseignes in hand, for the increase and beaurefying of this Estate, as his Predecessors durst neuer thinke of them? One Arcenall alone can furnish him a hundred Cannons, with powder and munition for a hundred thousand shot, Armes for ten thousand Horse-men, and fifty thousand foote, and Treasor ready to pay a greater number. This Prince who knewe what it was to make Warre without money, will neuer vndertake it without a iust cause, not being in want. Warre which is attempted without cause is feldome happy and successfull, and although they bee iustificable yet is there alwaies some scruple. Hee spent the best part of the yeare at Fontainebleau, and found his abode there so pleasing and the season so faire, as hee sent for the Dauphin. It was the first voiage to the place of his birth, and the second by Paris. Hee made shewe that hee did participate of the Fathers good disposition, for hee neither feared nor felt Son nor Serein, although it be much felt in that place. Thus the yeare past, when as France could not furnish where-withall to make a perfect Narration. Wee may nowe say as it was heeretofore sayd of the Gauls that they were more giuen to Tillage and to the Gouernment of their families, then vnto Warre and Armes. The most factious thinke of nothing nowe but of planting of their Orchards. The Crisons doe still pursue the demolition of the fort. They talke of a truce in Hungarie, and of a Treaty of Peace in the Lowe Countries. This wil bee matter to write on the next yeare following.

F But wee may not forget the entervewe of the Duke of Sauoy with the Duke of Montmaur. It ministred matter of discourse, and made the Princes of Italie somewhat lealons: to see two Princes send Ambassadors which had continued so long in 1604. badde termes, and two Princes that were Neighbours, which had this aduantage to A haue made Warre in person, was not without scruple. And although in thewe they talked onely of Peace, yet are they not the first, that haue had Peace in their mouthes and Warre in their hearts. Machiavel sayth that a Prince of his time, neuer talked but of a Peace and Faith, and if hee had kept either of them hee had lost his Estate and his Reputation.

The two Princes haue Lands lying of either side of the Riuer of Po. The Duke of Sauoy was discontented that the Duke of Mantoua people had vsurped somthing vpon his subiects. This was a great dispute of their confines, the which notwithstanding was soone reconciled, the Accord is neuer difficult betwixt persons neere allied. The Duke of Mantoua came to Montferrat, which gaue the occasion of B this entervewe, whereof the cause is vnkowne, if it bee not for the marriage of his Sonne to the Dukes second Daughter. They met in the open field on Sunday the 12. of December. The Duke of Sauoy was in Carosse, and the Duke of Mantoua and his Sonne on Horse-backe: They lighted to entertaine and salute on an other. The Noblemen and Gentlemen which followed them made a great ring, in the which these two Princes did walke and talked together two or three houres. The Duke of Sauoy feasted him at dinner the Twel-day following, in a little house vpon the frontier of the Marquisate of Salusses. They continued together vntill night, when parting the Duke of Sauoy gaue vnto the Duke of Mantoua foure goodly Horfes with very riche furniture. To conclude this yeares worke there was newe matter presently, but it is C alwaies bad, when as the Princes Clemency is forced to yeeld vnto his Iustice, when as France doth bring forth Spirits to easie to corrupt, as intelligences with the Enemies of this Crowne are not held for crimes, and their Honour as vaine smoake, the which notwithstanding should bee so carefully preferred, that rather then to see it blemished or charged with any reproch, they should desire and offer themselves to death.

The King offended with the practises of the Count of Auvergne, commanded him to come vnto him, and to trust vnto his Clemency, the which was not vnkowne vnto him. Desfures made some iorneyes vnto him, from whome hee brought nothing but delaies and excuses.

The King
sends for the Count of Au-vergne.

The Kings Iustice was once contented to make him change the ayre for a time. It D was the best Councell his friends could giue him: it was the surest resolution hee could take: for it was better to bee absent with the Kings good liking, then to bee retired and in disgrace. The King was wonderfully greued at this relapse, and did im-pute it to an error which great courages detest more, and pardon lesse, then all other fautes: for compare Vice with Vice and Euill with Euill, Ingratitude is the most odious and the worst. This Prince notwithstanding (who cannot leaue pardonning) sent Desfures backe vnto him to cause him to come. Hee promised to goe if they would bring him a pardon formally made. The King disliked of this kinde of Capitulation, whereas his owne Authority was wronged and his worde held deceitfull.
A great King so much feared and obeyed, and of so great Authority, should E haue his words as much credited as an others oath. It is not with this Prince as with some of his Predecessors, who vnder the most smyling and calme countenance smothered most dangerous and trouble some tempests. Hee sent him his Abolition in the same forme and vertue that he desired, conteyning all the euill that hee had done, and all that hee would haue donne. It teacheth the Honour of a Prince to iustifie himselfe, when as his Innocencie is any thing mistrusted or suspected of his King.
In these Incounters hee must leaue the charges which hee holds, as Caius Menenius did: hee must returne in the midst of his voiage like vnto Mare Antonie, hee must quite all Legations to preuent all Accusations, and hee must oppose his Innocencie bouldly and couragiously, vnto slander. But hee that hath once offended his Prince hee hath no other remedie or refuge but to his Clemencie, or to flight.

A Pardon granted to him on condition.

This

A This pardon had a condition that hee should come vnto the King, without the 1604. which the effect thereof should bee suspended and without assurance. Hee got nothing in growing obstinate not to go out of Clermont, representing vnto himselfe that hee could finde no better Councell then in the remembrance of his last Emprisonment, as Cresus did in his miseries. He did build much vpon the Loue of the Inhabitants of Clermont and of the Country. But hee did not consider that although hee had many hearts at his deuotion, yet should hee hardly drawe them all together to oppose them against the Kings commandements, when it should please him to seize vpon him in that City, and that it were more safe for him to be free without the Vineyard, then to remaine there, not being absolute Maister thereof.

Aduerity
doth mislead.

The King
giues order to haue him taken.

B The King therefore seeing that hee would not come but with conditions that did not agree with a perfect obedience, resolved to haue him, by one meanes or other. The first Ouertures were made to the two Brothers of Murat, the one Lieutenant Generall in the Presidiall Court at Rion, the other Treasorer extraordinary of the Warres, both vehemently affected to the Kings seruice, and for this reason greatly suspected by the Count of Auvergne, who to let them vnderstand the actions that hee would haue knowne, did often confer with them of his affaires, but in like manner as Princes doe communicate with Ambassadors and Spies, and the more freely for that he thought they were not men to lead him to Paris. But there were others to execute his com-mandements, and more then of one condition, all resolved to take him, yea though hee

C were shut vp in a Towre of brasse. So there must bee some to take him and other to conduct him when hee was taken. It was necessary that such as had the Kings authority in the Prouince, and the disposition of his forces and of Iustice should deale in it.
The Kings intention was imparted to the Vicount of Pont du Chastell, to D'Enrie Lieutenant of the Duke of Vandosmes company, to the Baron of Camilac, to la Boutaye Lieutenant to the company of the Marquis of Verneuil, to Nereflan Colonell of a Regiment of foote, and to so many others as it is a wonder it was not diuulged being in so many heads. In this action all shewed the duties and affections of good men which respected their Honours. Many meanes were attempted, but they were incountered

D with great difficulties and crosses. True it is that if Nereflan had not come with reuo-cation of the Kings first commandements, his taking had beene certaine when as hee went a hunting to la Tour of Buissiere, where as a Gentleman should haue bidden him to diner. The Order was changed for that hee had giuen the King to vnderstand that he had meanes to do him a great peece of seruice in the discouery of great secrets. Some dayes past in the expectation of this miracle, but in the ende it proued nothing. The Kings patience beeing wronged would beleue no more, but commanded that they should force him to come, and if his Bounty had not restrained him, wee should haue seene him as extreame in reuenge, as hee hath alwaies beene Bounty and Clemency. Hee earnestly recommended vnto his subiects the execution of this prize,

The Kings
patience moou-
ed.

E as a thing of great importance for his seruice, for the preservation of the State and the assurance or safety of my Lord the Daulphin. The surest meanes (& that wherein there was least trouble and scandall) was the mustering of the Duke of Vandosmes Company, who by the aduice of the Count of Auvergne himselfe, and to please a Ladie who desired to be reuenged of some Country-men, dislodged from Saint Portin to come to Balsac and to Vornie, where they intreated their Hostes in such sort as they left not pro-uision for three daies to some one that had beene furnished for three yeares.

They resol-ued to take him by what meanes soe-uer.

D'Enrie who prest Murat (Treasorer extraordinary of the Warres) to paie his company a muster, intreated the Count of Auvergne to see it, to the ende hee might assure the King that hee had Gallant men and good Horfes, and that all his Companions should bee wonderfully Honored with the presence of their Coronell. I will part to morrowe sayd the Count of Auvergne to hunt at Alezou, and will returne again on Monday at night, I pray you bee heere at super and lodge your company at Normain, to the ende that the next day after that wee haue dronke, runne at the ring and dined, we may see it.

Tttt 3

This

1604. This was done as he had appointed, and it seemes he was an Actor in his own misfortune, and an instrument of his misery, not being able to discouer the bitterness of those Golden-pills which they presented vnto him. D'Errre came to Clermont on Monday at night, and goes vnto him where he supped in one of their houses that managed this businesse. When as he espied D'Errre a farre off, hee said vnto him, Now Sir, am I not a Man of my word? D'Errre thanked him for the paine it had pleased him to take to see his Companions, beseeching him to thinke that he desired it with great affection, to the ende the King might knowe they were not in so bad estate as at the voyage of Metz. The next day the ninth of Nouember the morning was spent in running at the Rings, of foure courses he tooke three. He had intelligence that they ment to take him, and distrusting all, he had resolved to come so early to the place of musters, as not finding the company there ready, he should be excused if he did not attend them, meaning to passe on a league farther, where a Lady that loued him did expect him. D'Errre hauing foreseene all, leauing nothing to hazard that might be gouerned by Iudgement, vied such preuentions, as the subtilties of this spirit preuailed nothing. He commanded La Bady Marshall of the company to see his Companions in order. Hee aduertised Nereffan and the Captaines that did assist him, of the place whether they should come, & wrought so, that Dilligence and Courage which are the wings of great executions, were so supported by the secret of discretion, as none of the Troupe once drempt of that which was to be done.

The Duke of Vendomes company was not in good order at the voyage of Metz.

He is preuented by the dilligence of D'Errre.

He goes to Horse with two more with him,

They went to dinner, and it was well obserued that the Count of Auvergne had some distrust. He hath since confest that hee was ready to call the two Brothers of Murat into his Cabinet, and to cause them to bee searcht, for that he was well aduertised that they alwayes carryed the Kings Letters and his commandments. But a great resolution thinking that there is no more harme in fearing, then in the thing that causeth feare, he feared extremely to make shewe that hee hath any feare. After Dinner D'Errre asked If it pleased him to go to horse to see the Musters. Hee answered him; That it should be presently, and that he should vse speed. Hee retyred himselfe soone after into his Cabinet, and went downe being followed by Maisonville onely and Liuerne, mounted vpon a Scottish Horse (which Vitry had giuen him) the which would haue outrunne all the Horses of France. He would not attend the other Noblemen for that he distrusted them, hauing an intent to passe on, if he found them not ready. But beeing come to the place, he found the company in battell. This great dilligence made him somewhat iealous, and they might perceiue him, that pulling vp his Cloake, he drew his Sword foure fingers out, yet without any amazement. D'Errre seeing him make euen the reynes of his Horse, came to him trotting, with his Hat in his hand, and hearing him sweare with a great oath that he had beene very dilligent. You may see my Lord (answered he) I haue caused my Companions to aduance, for that I would not trouble you with attendance. Monsieur D'Errre (replied the Earle) you are one of my Friends, I cannot make any long stay here. To whome D'Errre said. All my Companions are not yet here, but if it please you, you shall see this Troupe, and iudge of the whole by a part. Here vpon he sees some Horse-men come and demands what they were. D'Errre told him; That it was Nereffan who had bene at Rion about a fate of his daughters. Hee beleued it, for he knewe that Nereffan had stayd some dayes at Rion and yet his heart began to suspect more. But it was too late, hee was environed on euery side, and hardly can one resist many. Nereffan lighted to salute him, and hauing enterrayned him with some discourse vpon the occasion of his staye at Rion, or of his returne to Court, he went presently to Horse-backe, and thrust on one of the Lackquais with his tooke, for a signe and token of the beginning of the execution.

One of Nereffans three Lackquais takes holde of his Horse by the Bridle. D'Errre seeing that Nereffan had taken the right side to salute the Count of Auvergne went vnto the left, and laying hold with his Hand vpon the Hilt of his Sword

A Sword hee sayd vnto him that hee had commandement from the King to take him, 1604. The other two Laquais pulled him so roughly from his horse, as he had like to haue fallen to the ground, hee was moued to see himselfe so intreated by Laquais, intreating D'Errre to cause two of his companions to light, and that hee might not see those rascalls any more: Nereffan sayd vnto him that they were soldiers so attyred, to serue the King in this action. A peece shott into the ayre by chace, made him to doubt worse measure, so as hee intreated D'Errre that hee would not vse his Pistol. D'Errre freed him from these apprehensions, intreating him to resolve vpon the Kings will, and not to force them to intreat him otherwise then they desired. Well said hee, I yeeld, what will you haue mee to doe? That you mount vpon the Trompets horse, B sayd D'Errre. It was feared that hee would not haue suffered himselfe to bee taken so easily nor so quietly, as wee haue seene many great courages choose rather to be cutt in peeces, then to see themselves referred for some shamefull end, and others that haue willingly dyed, for that they would not die by force. When as he sees himselfe in the Toyle inuironed on all sides, Liuerne his confident follower in flight, & his friends the ministers of his Captiuitie, hee sayd, Ah in the Diuels name, I doubted all this. Being mounted vpon the Trompets Nagg, they conduct him presently to Aigueperse. Before hee had gone a hundred paces, he intreated D'Errre to lend him one of his troupe, to carrie some message of his remembrance, and of his miserie, to a Ladie that attended him. De Pleche had the charge. Shee who had not prepared her heart to withstand the assaults of a most extreme and sensible greefe, tooke D'Errre for the obiekt, against whome shee poured forth the furie of her passions. If I knew (sayd shee vnto this Gentleman,) that I might saue him in forcing through your troupe, I would willingly doe it, and if I had but tenne Men of my courage and resolution, you should not carrie him where you thinke. But I will neuer die vntill I haue giuen D'Errre a hundred shott with a pistoll, and to Murat a hundred blowes with a sword. These were the passions of her loue, transported with a resolution beyond her sexe, and which did participate of a Man, of a troubled mind, and of Loue. This last makes miracles of manuell, and manuell of miracles, in wills that are equally toucht with his inspirations. So it is neuer perfect, if it bee not full and neerely toucht with the accidents of both fortunes, as the Moone is not pleasing, but when it is at the full. Shee loued him well, and was well beloued: for the Count of Auvergne hath bene heard say, that if the King did set him at libertie, and send him backe to his house, vpon condition that hee should not see this Ladie, hee would rather desire to die. Shee presently ordered the affaires of her house, the disposition of her furniture, and the retreat of her seruants. This passion going from the memorie to the thought, from the thought to the heart, from the heart to the eyes, made her to poure forth so many teares, as shee lost the sight of one eye for a tyme.

They set him vpon the Trompets horse.

They conduct him to Aigueperse.

The extreme greefe of a Ladie that loued him.

E Being at Aigueperse he writt vnto the King. At the same place hee told the Baron of Camillac, that hee was acquainted with the dessein of his taking. It is true sayd hee, I knew it well, and I beleue you thinke I am a very honest man. He sayd that hee submitted himselfe to all the rigours of the Kings Iustice, if hee had sayd, done, thought, or attempted any thing since his Abolition. All the way hee seemed no more afflicted, then when hee was at libertie. Hee tould youthfull and idle tales of his Loue, and the deceiuing of Ladies. Hee shott in a harguebule at birds, wherein hee was so perfect and excellent, as hee did kill Larkes as they were flying. Sometimes hee would cast forth wordes of apprehension to enter into that great heape of stones of the Bastille, where hee had already tried his patience for the space of foure or foue monethes. Descares mett him at Briarre, and there hee entred into a Carosse, and was garded and led vnto Montargis, and from thence hee was imbarcked vpon the ruer, and presently conducted vnto the Bastille, without passing by the Arcenall: And entering into the Duke

The Count of Auvergne writes vnto the King.

I 604. He assures the of his innocency. of Birons chamber, hee knew his bed with some feeling of greefe, and taking leaue of them that had conducted him, he assured them that hee would goe out of that place as he had entred, and if they found him more guiltie then he had sayd, he desired them not to pittie him. Entering in he sayd vnto Ruigny, that he had rather lodge in any Tap-house in Paris, then in the Bastille. Those that beleue that he is not lodged there to get out, so soone as hee did the other time, thinke also that it is the worst that can happen vnto him. But it shall be an incomparable miserie to bee alwayes deprived of the Kings grace and fauour, without the which the best conditions are most lamentable, and a life of this manner how short soeuer, is a tedious and a languishing Life, it is no Life, it is to languish and to abuse Life.

A happy discovery of Conspiracies. The happy discovery and so fitly, of all that was done, and in a manner thought against the Kings seruice, is no small signe of the prosperity of his Raigne, and of his Fortune; and an assurance that those heads which shall strike against this rocke of Diamant will proue Glasfe. The desseignes of his enemies haue sometimes shewed themselues like vnto fixed Starres in the Firmament of their ambition, and in the end they haue proued but Comets & exhalations, which drawne out off the Earth, haue bene lost in the Ayre of their Vanity and Imagination. All these practises in the end were like vnto those poore wretched Cottages, built vp of Durt and couered with Stubble. And if all the Conspirators bee not yet taken yet they do nothing, being discovered and knowne to the eyes of the Kings Iustice. Conspiracies are like vnto Coales, which in the shadowe do flame, but when as the Sunne shines on them they fall into ashes. It is not the severity nor the Rigour of his Iustice, neither the terrour of examples and punishments, that hath discovered these Conspiracies. He hath not caused the Bell of Ramire King of Spainne, to bee rung to terrifie all the Conspirators with the found thereof. This King being offended with the Conspiracies of his Subjects, sayd, that hee would show them a Bell, the which hee had caused to bee cast, the found whereof might be heard throughout all the whole world. Curiosity made them goe, and they found in a great place the Heads of the principall men of the Realme, set one vpon another in forme of a Bell. It is the great obedience that is yeelded vnto the King, euen by them that are least inured to obey, that hath discovered these practises: It is the great Wisdom of his carriage, & the Order he hath taken to be aduertised of all and to knowe all. It is the Authority and respect which neuer was to absolute and perfect in his Predecessors as in him. This apprehension was a famous president. For the time was when he must haue had more men to take the Count of Auvergne and to conduct him vnto Paris without ler.

Confiderations upon his taking. Wee may obserue in this apprehension many things that may breed Admiration and amazement, and which shewe that Men do in vaine furnish themselues with Wisedome against Heauen, and with Intelligences against the King. The Count of Auvergne had aduertisements from all places that they should take him, and that the Kings Pensioners were in the field to that effect. His most inward and neere friends, and among others Florack knewe it, and said nothing vnto him, preferring his duty to his Prince before all affection. The Constable was also as well informed thereof as any other, and yet he made no shewe thereof. A shewe of great Wisedome. His duty prescribed him a Lawe to all the bounds of Nature; so there is not any one but is more bound to the seruice of the King and his Country, then to his owne health, or to that of his Children. A Gentleman being at his Table speaking of this taking, said, Sir if the King should command mee to take you I would doe it, although I bee your most humble seruant, that you march in the first rankes of Greatnesse in the Realme, and that all things touching Armes, depend vpon your commandments. I beleue it (answered the Constable) elſe you should do ill, for the King is both your King and mine. I am your Friend. There is no loue nor affection to dispence any one from the Kings Commandments.

The Count of Auvergne long before and since his taking, hath not said nor done any

I 604. A any thing whereof the Kings seruants haue not kept register. He complained of those that were daily about him, that they sayd nothing vnto him, and they all answered, that they were too honest to tell him any thing. Hee is a Prince of great understanding, capable of all sorts of desseins, of a quicke disposition, warlike, vigilant, and full of inuentions and subtilties. But all this auayled him nothing against the King, of whome wee may say that hee hath wicked wretches inough in his Kingdome that would deceiue him, but they are not cunning enough to doe it so.

B Soone after that the Count of Auvergne was lodged in the Bastille, D'Amiragues Governor of Orleans was committed to the Concergerie of the Pallace, and the Marquis of Fernuill his daughter garded in her house, by the Knight of the watch. Since that hee tried, that hee that is capable to loue earnestly, may also hate extremely. Wee can say nothing of the causes of this change, but what may bee learned by the issue of the Proceſſe. They bee affaires which concerne the King, his Person and his State, and if it bee tollerable to heare what is sayd, yet is it not lawfull to speake or publish it. His Maiestie himselfe hath not yet declared the cause of the Count of Auvergne restraint, and in the letter which hee did write vnto the Gouverneur of Lions vpon that subiect, hee did onely lend him these wordes, You haue vnderstood how that I haue againe caused the Count of Auvergne to bee apprehended, being aduertised that hee continued still in his bad practises, and that hauing sent often for him, hee would not come. At the least, I will keepe him from doing ill if I can. (At the same time, when

C as the Count of Auvergne was taken, the brute was that the Duke of Bouillon had like to haue bene surprized. When as he could find no other refuge for his stayes, but to retire himselfe out of the Realme, hee had vied the libertie of his retreat wisely, and hath alwayes sought the Kings fauour, for the assurance of his returne. Some forraigne Prince of his friends aduised him not to returne to Court, to hold all reconciliation suspect, and to beleue, that when a Prince is once offended, he is neuer quiet vntill the offence bee reuenged. That hee must not trust to that which hee promisseth, nor to that which hee swears, houlding both the one and the other lawfull for reuenge. That the word of a Prince that is offended, is like vnto Zenxis cluster of D grapes, which takes Birds, but his oth is like vnto Parrasius vayle, which deceiues Men. Those which haue lost the fauour of their master (for that they had intelligence with them, whome they could not serue without cryme) are alwayes in continuall distrust, the which followes the offence, as the Boat doth the Shippe, vntill they haue quenched and smothered the cause, and made it knowne that they are diuided, and enemies to all their wils, that would distract them from their duties, for Men that are double and dissemblers, are neuer tamed, no more then a Batt, which is halfe a Ratt, and halfe a Bird, or the Chastor which is flesh, and fish. The Duke of Bouillons patience hauing giuen the King time enough to consider of his intentions, is redie through the Kings Clemencie, to obtaine all that he could desire, to returne to a greater fortune, in the which lesse is allowed then to a meaner estate.

E The Duke Tremouille ended his fortune by death. Hee might haue dyed when as the King would haue lamented the losse of him more, for hee was not now well pleased with certaine wordes which had bene reported vnto him, and if hee had liued, he would haue bene in paine to excuse himselfe of the commandement hee had made him to come vnto him to answere it: From hence spring two fruitfull considerations, the one, that there is nothing so fearefull and terrible as the threats and disgrace of his King, the other, that it is alwayes dangerous to speake ill of his Prince. For the first, Cassander greatly feared Alexander, euen when hee was dead, for that hee had seene him once transported with choller against him. And although that after the death of Alexander he was aduanced to the Throne of Macedon, yet walking in the Cittie of Delphos, and hauing seene an Image of Alexanders, who was 1604. was nowe rotten in his graue, he did so tremble as his Hayre stood right vp, his knees A fayled him, and the paleness of his countenance shewed his amazement, and the terrible assault which his memory gaue him: for the second, when a free speeche hath once escaped against the respect of the Prince, he must haue a great and a strong Citi-ty as Lisander sayd to defend his liberty of speech. They haue neither Friendes nor Councell against the King, and if their misery findes any shadowe or protection, it is but like vnto Jonas Gourd of one night. Let them not flatter themselves in the great-nes of their houses nor their Allyances, this qualitie doth but increase their offence.

 Princes are not so much moued with that which the common people do, as with the Lycentious words of great men. Caius disguised himselfe into as many fashions as he imagined there were Gods. A Cobler seing him set in his Pallace like Iupiter, B with a scepter in one hand, a Thunderbolt in the other, and an Eagle by his side, burst out in a great laughter. Caius causing him to come neere, asked him why he laughd. I laugh at this foolerie, answered the Cobler. The Emperour laughd also, suffering it to passe freely without choller, yet punishing other speeches seuerely which came from persons better quallified.

Thus ends the seuenth yeare after the conclusion of the Peace.
